STATEMENT.

The Senate amendment adds certain material enlarging the description of the purposes for which lands or easements may be acquired under the act. Attention has been called to objects other than those included in the bill in the form in which it passed the House, and this addition is regarded as desirable. Accordingly the House concur, but it is recommended that section 2 of the act be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4438 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4438. The boards of local inspectors shall license and classify the masters, chief mates, and second and third mates, if in charge of a watch, engineers, and pilots of all steam vessels, and the masters and chief mates of sail vessels of over 700 gross tons and all other vessels of over 100 gross tons carrying passengers for hire. It shall be unlawful to employ any person, or for any person to serve, as a master, chief mate, engineer, or pilot of any steamer or as master of any sail vessel of over 700 gross tons, or of any other vessel of over 100 gross tons carrying passengers for hire, who is not licensed by the inspectors; and anyone violating this section shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each offense."

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 9 strike out the words "and chief mates."

In line 13, after the word "engineer," insert the words "in charge of a watch."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like an explanation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Under the present statutes there is some discrepancy as to the license of engineers. This bill—it is recommended by both committees of the Senate and the House and by the Department of Commerce and Labor—is to simplify and rectify the present law. It is not a matter of great importance, but they want to pass a bill to get rid of licensing a number of engineers on small vessels.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This exempts the smaller vessels that do not carry passengers?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; they have to carry license officers, but not so many. I assure the gentleman that everybody is in favor of this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It has been considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and was the unanimous report of both the Senate and House committees.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney-General or any officer of the Department of Justice, or any attorney or counselor specially appointed by the Attorney-General under any provision of law, may, when thereunto specifically directed by the Attorney-General, conduct any kind of legal proceeding, civil or criminal, including grand jury proceedings and proceedings before committing magistrates, which district attorneys now are or hereafter may be by law authorized to conduct, whether or not he or they be residents of the district in which such proceeding is brought.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 6483) to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa."

In estimating such confinement the time consumed in loading and unloading shall not be considered, but the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest or food or water on connecting roads shall be included, it being the intent of this act to prohibit their continuous confinement beyond the period of twenty-eight hours, except upon the contingencies hereinbefore stated: Provided, That it shall not be required that sheep be unloaded in the nighttime, but where the time expires in the nighttime in case of sheep the same may continue in transit to a suitable place for unloading, subject to the aforesaid limitation of thirty-six hours.

SEC. 3. That any railroad, express company, car company, common carrier other than by water, or the receiver, trustee, or lessee of any of them, or the master or owner of any steam, sailing, or other vessel who knowingly and willfully fails to comply with the provisions of the two preceding sections shall for every such failure be liable for and forfeit and pay a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $500: Provided, That when animals are carried in cars, boats, or other vessels in which they can and do have proper food, water, space, and opportunity to rest, the provisions in regard to their being unloaded shall not apply.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4256) for the relief of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company's railroad, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska is hereby extended as follows:

First. The time to file the map and profile of definite location of its second section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907.

Second. The time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907, and such railroad and navigation company shall be entitled to all the benefits conferred upon it by the provisions of such act upon its due compliance with all the provisions thereof, excepting only the provisions thereof relating to the filing of the map and profile of definite location of its second section of not less than 20 miles of its road: Provided, That it shall have successively one year each after said 20th day of March, 1907, in which to file the map and profile of its definite location of the succeeding sections of not less than 20 miles each: And provided further, That it shall have five years in which to complete its entire line from Iliamna Bay to the Yukon River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give what is known as the "Alaska Shortline Railway and Navigation Company" additional time for making their surveys and for the completion of their railway. This railroad is one that is about 250 miles north of any other railway. It goes in from Cook Inlet across to the Yukon River, and there has been no one opposed to the bill. It does not conflict with any other railway, and I can see no reason in the world why this additional time should not be granted. The bill has the unanimous report of the committee in the House, as well as the committee in the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the conditions under which the railroad is authorized to build? What has it to do? What does the Government impose upon it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It imposes upon it that it shall complete its first 20 miles of railroad in a given time—in a year—and they now ask a yearly extension.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of the railroad have they built now?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. How long since the franchise was granted?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I don't know the exact date, but they were to complete it in 1906, and they now ask an extension until 1907.

Mr. HAMILTON. What is the name of the railroad?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The Shortline Railway and Navigation Company.

Mr. MADDEN. This road is proposed to be 250 miles long?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the company is required to build 20 miles within a given time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; each year.

Mr. MADDEN. It has not built any part of the first 20 miles? It has just made some surveys?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would suggest that an extension has been had once in this matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not for this railroad.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. This bill was sought to be taken up under suspension of the rules.

Mr. HAMILTON. No; this is not the railroad at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This road is 250 miles farther north than the road which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the Government do for the company?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Nothing whatever. The road does not ask any assistance of any kind.

Mr. HAMILTON. What are the termini of this road?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Cook Inlet and the Yukon River.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems that nobody knows anything about this road, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS KENTUCKY RIVER AT BEATTYVILLE, KY.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20287) to authorize George Hammons, Charles Vaunice, and F. A. Lyons to construct a bridge across Kentucky River at Beattyville, Ky., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That George Hammons, Charles Vaunice, and F. A. Lyons be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a foot, wagon, and railway bridge and approaches thereto across the Kentucky River, or either branch thereof, at Beattyville, in the State of Kentucky, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20409) to authorize the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Red River, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at or near section 34, township No. 163 north of range No. 51 west, Pembina County, N. Dak., in the States of North Dakota and Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

WICHITA MOUNTAIN AND ORIENT RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take the bill S. 6444 from the Speaker's table, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6444) to authorize the Wichita Mountain and Orient Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Fort Sill Military Reservation, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That theWichita Mountain and Orient Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, empowered to survey, locate, construct, and maintain a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through Fort Sill Military Reservation, in the Territory of Oklahoma, upon such a line as may be determined and approved by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a railway, telegraph, and telephone line, and for no other purpose, a right of way 100 feet in width through said Fort Sill Military Reservation, and a right to take and use a strip of land in said reservation 200 feet in width, with a length of 3,000 feet, in addition to such right of way, for station, with the right to use such additional ground when cuts and fills may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 100 feet in width on each side of the right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of such railway, telegraph, and telephone lines; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be used such portion shall revert to the United States, from which the same shall be taken: Provided further, That the said railway company, its successors and assigns, shall fence its right of way and maintain the same, with suitable crossings, and provide suitable and sufficient side tracks at a station to be located upon said reservation, and shall construct and maintain sufficient stock pens and provide sufficient facilities for loading and unloading cattle and horses on the ground set apart for such station, all as the same may be designated and located and as required by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That the said Wichita Mountain and Orient Railway Company shall comply with such other regulations or conditions as may from time to time be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of that bill. All that I could obtain from the reading of the Clerk was that it is to construct a railroad across a military reservation.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill has already passed the Senate and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and has the approval of the Secretary of War as well. It simply provides for a right of way through the Fort Sill Military Reservation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand it now. I could not hear before.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Oh, the unanimous consent runs with the Senate bill.

Mr. MILLER. All right.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

COMMITMENT OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS TO REFORMATORIES OF STATES OR TERRITORIES.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12869.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. PARKER. It is a substitute, and I should like to have the Clerk read the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the substitute will be read in lieu of the text of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5548 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5548. Whenever any person is convicted of any offense against the United States which is punishable by fine and imprisonment, or by either, the court by which the sentence is passed may order the sentence to be executed in any house of correction or house of reformation for juvenile delinquents within the State or district where such court is held, the use of which is authorized by the legislature of the State for such purpose, or in any State reformatory within any State, the use of which is so authorized, and which is an institution accepted by the Department of Justice as a suitable place for the imprisonment and reformation of such convicted persons.

"And if by the laws of such State persons within certain limits of age may be committed to such reformatory for an indeterminate time and become entitled to be released upon parole under the authority and control of the State officers, and with obligation to report and to conform to regulations as to paroled prisoners, and subject to rearrest for breach of such parole, then and in such case persons within such age, convicted of offense in the United States courts, may, in the discretion of the court, be committed to such reformatory under an indeterminate sentence so that the imprisonment of such persons shall be upon like conditions as to release on parole, rearrest, confinement, and discharge as prisoners sentenced by the courts of said State to such institution: Provided, That the Attorney-General shall first approve any order for release of any such person on parole, or for his discharge in case he fulfills the conditions of such parole and is leading an honest and industrious life: Provided further, That in case such person shall fail to fulfill the conditions of such parole, the superintendent or warden of the reformatory to which he shall have been committed may revoke such parole and issue a warrant for the rearrest of such person, which warrant may be executed by any officer authorized by the law of said State to execute warrants, or by a United States marshal; and such person on arrest shall be promptly returned to the reformatory, where he may be retained for the remainder of the maximum term provided by law, after deducting his previous imprisonment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to revise and amend the United States statutes relating to the commitment of United States prisoners to reformatories of States."

GRAND LODGE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 6448, and that there be immediate consideration thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, that is rather an unusual request, with so many Senate bills——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6448) to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to say that this is a rather unusual request, in view of the fact that there are so many Senate bills that have passed through the House committees and are on the Calendar, and this is a request to discharge this committee from further consideration; but having heard the object of the bill, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Consent is given; and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia, a corporation created under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved June 12, 1860, be and hereby is authorized to sell and convey, for such sum as may be satisfactory to the several organizations hereinafter named as owners, those parcels of ground in the city of Washington, D. C., known and designated on the plat of said city as lot No. 11 and part of lot No. 10 in square No. 457, together with the buildings thereon known as "Odd Fellows' Hall," the title to which property is now held in trust by the said corporation for the following organizations, owners thereof, namely: The Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia; Columbian Encampment, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Central Lodge, No. 1, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Washington Lodge, No. 6, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Columbia Lodge, No. 10, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Beacon Lodge, No. 15, Independent Order of Odd Fellows; Excelsior Lodge, No. 17, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Eastern Lodge, No. 7, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the consent of each of said several organizations being evidenced by a written instrument bearing the seal and the signature of its executive officers, the proceeds of said sale to be applied to the payment and liquidation of an existing debt on said property, and the residue of said proceeds to be applied toward the purchase of other ground and the erection thereon of a building or buildings for like purposes as those for which the above-described property has been held, said ground to be purchased and the improvements to be held in trust for said above-mentioned organizations according to their respective interests in the net proceeds of said sale of said Odd Fellows' Hall, and for such other organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows as may hereafter contribute to the cost of said ground and improvements according to the amount respectively contributed by each: Provided, That the purchaser or purchasers at said sale shall not be required to see to the proper application of said purchase money.

SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall be capable of taking and holding real and personal property in trust for said organizations to any value not exceeding the sum of $500,000, and shall have full power and authority upon a resolution or resolutions of each of said beneficiary organizations to, from time to time, encumber said ground so to be purchased and the improvements thereon, or any part thereof, in such manner, for such purposes, and in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by said resolution or resolutions.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

HELEN C. SANDERSON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following Senate concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 25, 1906.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 3028) granting an increase of pension to Helen C. Sanderson.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC-BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this order it shall be in order to consider the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, under all the conditions prescribed by the rules relating to suspension of the rules, except that the vote on suspending the rules and passing the bill shall be decided by a majority instead of two-thirds.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution relates to what is known as "the public-buildings bill," and simply makes it in order to consider that bill under a motion to suspend the rules, with this exception, that that motion requires for its passage only a majority and not two-thirds. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 193, noes 21.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to have twenty minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, in presenting what is known as the "Omnibus public-buildings bill" to the House for consideration and passage, permit me to say that this comprehensive measure represents the labor of many months and the diligent, conscientious, and, I believe I am justified in saying, the intelligent efforts of—barring the chairman, of course—every member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. More than 500 bills, calling for a total appropriation of nearly $60,000,000, were referred to that committee, and each one of them has been most carefully considered on its merits.

In preparing the bill the committee fixed a standard of population and postal receipts below which it refused to go except in cases presenting special features; that is, where the Internal-Revenue Service or the Customs Service called for special facilities.

The bill carries in round numbers $21,000,000. From what I have already stated, it is plain that in view of the growing needs of the country and the consequent demands upon Congress for more adequate facilities to transact the Government business, a bill twice the size of the one presented might easily have been prepared without exposing the committee to the charge of extravagance, but we preferred to hew to safe and conservative lines, and believe that the most urgent needs of the hour have been provided for, though many entirely just demands will have to be left to the consideration of a future Congress.

A new policy with respect to post-office buildings in the larger cities has been adopted by the committee, which policy we hope will receive the sanction of Congress and be strictly adhered to in the future. In those cities where Government buildings already exist, and where the facilities for the postal service are becoming inadequate, it seems to us to be the part of wisdom to authorize the erection of buildings for the postal business exclusively. The health and comfort of the many clerks and carriers who have to do their work in these buildings demand that they should be constructed with a view to affording good ventilation and ample light, which is not the case in the monumental and artistic buildings heretofore constructed. Moreover, these post-office buildings should be located in the closest possible proximity to the union depots or railway stations, so that not only the expense of hauling the mails to and from the post-offices be saved, but also considerable time in the transmission of the mails. In other words, instead of monumental structures costing vast amounts of money, buildings in the nature of workshops should be erected at an expense in cities of the second class of not exceeding $500,000. This policy has been strictly adhered to in the present bill, excepting in the cases of New Orleans and Atlanta. In the former city the present building is unfit for occupancy by any offices other than those of the Customs Service, and in the case of Atlanta the old Government building has been declared unfit and unsafe and will consequently be sold and a new building for the accommodation of all governmental offices will be erected.

In this connection, permit me to explain that as to the sale of old Government buildings, the committee has carefully avoided previous mistakes by providing that in no case shall the old building be sold until the new one is completed and ready for occupancy, the proceeds of the sales to be turned into the Treasury.

The grand total of the bill has been considerably swelled by the provisions for the larger cities, whose just claims have been deferred from Congress to Congress until they could no longer be ignored. Consequently the committee recommends an authorization of $1,000,000 for Pittsburg, $900,000 for Boston, $500,000 for Grand Rapids, $500,000 for Des Moines, $450,000 for New York, and $400,000 for St. Louis, etc. In the cases of New Orleans, Atlanta, and Houston, Tex., a preliminary authorization is made to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to begin the construction of the new buildings, the limit of cost of which has been fixed in the bill at $1,300,000 in the case of New Orleans, $1,000,000 for Atlanta, and $350,000 for Houston.

Upon examination of the bill, Members of the House will find, and I believe they will do the committee the justice to say so, that the claims of all sections of the country have been fairly and impartially considered, and that each item in the bill can not only stand upon its own merits, but also that each case has been adjudged without any regard to party differences or individual representation in the House.

Referring briefly to the criticism of local papers, that the city of Washington had been left out in the cold, I desire to remind the House of the fact that ten monumental structures are now in process of construction in this city, calling for a total appropriation of $18,000,000, which is more than the whole country has had in the building line for the last four years. The committee is of the opinion that the park and other projects which have been brought to its attention by citizens of Washington may safely be left to the consideration of a future Congress.

As is known to all Members, the buildings herein provided for will be erected under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and under the supervision of Mr. James Knox Taylor, the proficient Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague from Missouri yield to one question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. Referring to the item on page 25 of this bill, which carries an appropriation of $7,500 for the United States post-office building at Carrollton, Mo., in view of the misunderstanding, will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment changing that to $10,000?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that it will be impossible to accept an amendment to the bill at this time. If I should consent to that policy, there would possibly be a hundred amendments offered. I suggest that the gentleman leave this to the other side of the Capitol. I desire also to say, in connection with that item, that the necessity for an increased amount was called to the attention of the committee, and but for an error it would have been made.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demanded a second in order to give my friend the chairman of the committee a chance to make his speech, and having accomplished that, I have no further use for the time. I understand my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] would like some time in opposition to the bill. Does the gentleman desire any time? I yield five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, no Member of this House realizes better than I do the futility of opposing the passage of this bill. The time of this school is closing, and, following the universal practice of schools throughout this country, this great school is about to distribute its premiums. This bill illustrates as well as anything within my experience the "cohesive power of plunder." Here is a bill carrying $21,061,000, scattered indiscriminately throughout the country. Members can ascertain by examining this bill whether their conduct during their school term here has been such as gained the approbation of the authorities or whether they are among the "bad boys" of the House.

I think it is perfectly safe to assert that, outside of the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, not a single Member has looked at any provision in this bill, excepting those that affect his own district, and the action of Members upon the bill will be determined very largely in accordance with how much of the sum total is allotted to their districts. Indeed, as this bill has been printed only since this morning, it has been impossible for anyone to examine its provisions carefully.

Mr. Speaker, it so happens that the public building in the city from which I come is located in my district, and I find in the bill an appropriation for its enlargement. As there are six Members from that locality, I assume that they will all enjoy more or less credit for the appropriation that is made in this bill. But I wish to enter my protest against this method of making great appropriations. [Applause.] I do not care whether a single dollar is appropriated for a public building in my city unless the bill in which it is carried receives the proper and the usual and the decent consideration to which it is entitled in this House. So far as that item is concerned, I am perfectly willing to have this bill brought in in such a way that any Member of the House might exercise his judgment and exercise his right, and compel the chairman to justify that appropriation, and, if he were unable to do it, to have it, in the good judgment of the House, stricken from the bill.

I regret that it appears that a great majority of the Members of the House are not willing to have the items for their districts placed upon an equal footing. Now, inasmuch as I have had an opportunity simply to express my condemnation of this method of appropriating great sums for any public purpose, I am content. I know that protest is futile. The unanimity, not to say the enthusiasm, with which this bill has been brought into the House and is being urged to its passage is the best evidence that the committee has, at least in the distribution of money, been able to please a great majority of the House. [Prolonged applause.] And I hope that those who have been overlooked, that those who have been slighted, that those who have for some occult reason incurred the enmity of "the powers that be" in this House and been overlooked in the distribution will be able to justify the speed with which this bill is railroaded, and to justify the failure to provide adequately for their districts equally as well as those adequately treated. [Applause.]

I know, Mr. Speaker, that there is no power on earth or probably any place else that will stop the passage of this bill. [Applause.] I have no keen desire to stop it. I would not deprive so many Members of the pleasure that they anticipate; but I think it proper to protest against a method of legislation which prevents the Members of this House from exercising their rights as Members, and prevents those items in which they are particularly interested having the same scrutiny and the same watchful care that have been given to other items in appropriation bills in which particular districts are not interested. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I do not regard the remarks of the gentleman from New York in a spirit of levity, and I will say to him seriously that if he is willing to consider this bill with me and with the House, I am ready to consider and discuss every item, provided he is willing to stay here until Christmas, as we should have to do.

Mr. BURLESON. Are you willing to have unanimous consent granted to do that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have made no application that this bill be passed in this way. I assume that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] applied for this rule to take it out of the ordinary category of bills, and even went so far, in order to secure its passage, as to require only a majority instead of a two-thirds vote. There may be some justification for that, and I commend the gentleman's keen shrewdness in making certain that this bill would go through and would not fail, to the disappointment of so many.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the "gentleman from Missouri" has merely followed a time-honored custom. Now, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to make a few clerical corrections in the bill.

On page 20, in line 8, after the words "post-office," strike out the words "and court-house."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. What item is that?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is where there is no court-house and the bill says "court-house." It is in South Carolina.

On page 20, in lines 12 and 13, transpose from section 3 one paragraph on page 8.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. On page 21, in line 9, after the word "court-house," strike out the words "and custom-house;" and after the word "post-office" insert the word "and."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. On page 25, in line 5, after the word "Pontiac," strike out the word "city."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. On page 12, after the word "dollars," in line 6, insert the following:

Of which amount the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to expend so much as may be necessary for the acquisition of additional land for the enlargement of the site heretofore acquired.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

VALIDATING CERTAIN CERTIFICATES OF NATURALIZATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 18713) to validate certain certificates of naturalization, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

PASSENGER TRAFFIC ON EUROPEAN AND AMERICAN RAILROADS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document Senate Document No. 479, a statement of the comparative charges for passenger traffic on European and American railways.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is this?

Mr. SHERMAN. A statement of the comparative charges for passenger traffic in the United States and in Europe.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Made by whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. By Mr. H. T. Newcomb to Senator LODGE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 20153. It is exhausted in the document room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for the reprint of the bill referred to?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 20403—the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, before that is agreed to, I understand that to this bill has been added an amendment by the Senate which was not germane to the bill. The Committee on Rules has adopted a rule this morning——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is thinking of some other bill. This is the general deficiency bill, which is now up for consideration for the first time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, this is the general deficiency bill.

The motion of Mr. LITTAUER was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears that I was right, and that this is the bill in which the Senate had inserted an amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. This bill has never been in the Senate. This is the original general deficiency bill reported to the House yesterday for the first time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then you put the Senate bill upon this bill, did you not?

Mr. LITTAUER. I know of no Senate bill. There is included in this bill, on page 4, a provision in relation to the duties collected——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly what I was talking about a moment ago. When I wanted that information I was told I was mistaken. What I want to get at now is this: The Committee on Rules this morning held a meeting and drafted a rule to be submitted to the House to make germane to the bill the very provision of which I now speak.

Mr. LITTAUER. When that provision is reached, I had intended to ask the committee to pass it over without prejudice until all other items in the bill had been passed upon, that a full discussion might be had of this item. What I wanted to do was to make a point of order on that provision, and I wanted to reserve points of order in case that provision was in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All points of order have been reserved on the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then that is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the specific estimates for deficiencies submitted for consideration to the Committee on Appropriations amounted, in round figures, to $17,000,000. The bill now before you for consideration in specific items carries recommendation for a total of ten millions and a quarter. This very substantial reduction was brought about by the elimination of a few very large items. The chief of these eliminations was three millions and a quarter that had been submitted to us in connection with the disaster at San Francisco and in California. We found that while at one time it was believed that a further appropriation of at least a half a million was necessary to take care of the emergencies in connection with the conflagration, that after examining into the details of the expenditure of two millions and a half appropriated so promptly and generously by Congress and carefully scrutinizing how much had been expended and for what purposes, that instead of a shortage of half a million dollars there is still unexpended of that two million and a half appropriated about $400,000. The various bureaus, particularly in the military department, incurred very severe loss to their accumulated stores in connection with the disaster at San Francisco, and they sought very large appropriations to make good and replenish the various stores destroyed there; but after a thorough examination into the various items they desired to restore your committee came to the conclusion that with the very ample provisions especially made for the conduct of the military department for the next fiscal year we could cut down the amounts so deemed necessary by very substantial figures and still take care in a proper fashion of the needs of the department and also take care of the gradual replenishment and restocking of the storehouses.

The Quartermaster-General himself said that there were among the stores destroyed of his department a very substantial amount which need not be replenished. He estimated that at about 30 per cent. Despite all the reductions made in the estimates, this bill carries, because of the San Francisco disaster, two millions and over. First, there is $1,300,000 for the replenishment of the military stores. Then there is $600,000 necessary to repair and replace the public buildings damaged by earthquake and fire to the condition they were in before the disaster, and $150,000 for the replenishment of stores of the Marine Corps. In addition to this large item of reduction, we were able to make others because of the long continuance of this session of Congress. The fiscal year ending this week permits those in charge of the various Departments who thought they needed deficiencies to carry on their work to draw upon the appropriations for the next year within a few days, and in consequence we were able to eliminate $2,000,000 submitted to us as deficiencies for "increase of the Navy," and $750,000 asked for for an additional supply of coal for the Navy.

I want to call most earnestly the attention of the committee to a very irritating state of affairs in connection with the accumulation of claims arising from governmental operations which are frequently presented to the Committee on Appropriations and which fill the docket of the Committee on Claims of this House. There is now need for some general legislation or else some change in the rules of this House which will permit the consideration of claims arising through unforeseen emergencies, through accident, through legislation which circumscribes expenditure within too narrow limits or within limitations too technical for the requirements in the various departmental services, passed upon and approved by the Department, and yet incurred without warrant of law, and consequently not to be included in the general appropriation bill under the rules of this House as they now stand. Year after year we are eliminating lump-sum appropriations. We find they have led to high salaries and general extravagance. We are drawing tighter every year our specification for appropriations, so that there must be some leeway found for the consideration of these unavoidable claims. They pile together in the Committee on Claims. Many of them are reported out to the House, but few are ever considered here until they are gathered together in some large omnibus claim bill, and, of course, in such a claim bill the righteous and the unrighteous all come here together. In fact, it is through the consideration of the very large claims, and often very questionable claims, with which are connected very earnest and active attorneys, that these large omnibus claim bills are brought before the House and passed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the committee how much these claims are?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I know of one batch of 231 claims presented to us by the Quartermaster of the War Department which amount to a little over $24,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long have they been pending, as a rule?

Mr. LITTAUER. I should say about five years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] says some of them forty years.

Mr. LITTAUER. Those presented this year for immediate attention have been pending for about that extent of time. Every Member of the House and every citizen desires that the United States should pay its just debts and pay them promptly. Citizens of foreign nations enter their complaints through their embassies here that we give no attention to their just claims. The Secretary of State has communicated to Congress in reference to this matter during the present session. Above all, the claims of our own citizens, decided to be just and fair and meritorious, ought to have prompt and proper recognition by Congress. Your committee has had this matter under very serious consideration, but has suggested no legislation to take care of the situation. The members felt that they should follow the same course as was followed last year in connection with what are called "collision claims." In submitting the deficiency bill of last year the attention of the House was called to these collision claims. The regulations of the Navy, made under authority of law, require that in cases of collision of naval vessels with merchant or other vessels a court of inquiry shall be organized to determine the responsibility for the collision and the amount of damages occasioned thereby.

For many years the reports of these boards of inquiry were presented to Congress, and after a cursory examination were generally included in the deficiency bills, but with the growth of our Navy and the increases in the number of collisions, the committee refused to include many of the claims which seemed to them to be questionable. Last year twenty such claims were presented for action by the Committee on Deficiencies. They amounted to a total of $30,000, and the reason for the amounts awarded did not appear conclusive from the reports. The committee declined to recommend appropriations, but suggested that some legislation should be had in connection with such collisions that will clothe with necessary jurisdiction a proper court to ascertain and determine in each case that arose the responsibility therefor and the measure of compensation, if any, that should be made on the part of the United States. Congress having had attention called to this matter in last year's appropriation bill, took no action thereon. The number of collision claims continued to increase. Some of great importance were presented to us, and consequently in this bill we have submitted to the House legislation which will permit—the owner or owners, citizens, or aliens, of any ship or vessel, foreign or domestic, to sue the United States in any United States district court sitting as a court of admiralty—

I am reading only an extract from the provision which will be found on page 4 of the report—for any damage, loss or injury, attributable to mismanagement of any vessel owned by the United States or to the negligence or want of skill of those in charge thereof, by collision.

The provision inserted in the bill on page 75 was similar to a bill offered to this House, drawn, as we were advised, by eminent admiralty lawyers conversant with this class of cases so as to protect properly the interests of the Government, and I trust the House will give serious consideration when it is reached.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS. Are the provisions of your proposed legislation broad enough to allow private individuals compensation for other damages than collisions between Government vessels and private vessels?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think so.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman is aware there are claims arising for damage to cables and piers and other property which do not arise from collisions.

Mr. LITTAUER. This legislation proposed is for "any damage, loss, or injury to such ship or vessel, or owner or owners, or to the owners of any cargo laden thereon, or to any property on board thereof, arising from or attributable to the mismanagement of any vessel owned by the United States, or to the negligence or want of skill of those in charge thereof, by collision;" so we think it covers only collision cases.

Mr. PARSONS. In the case of a war vessel where they admit the Government officers were at fault, and they, together with the owner of the vessel, agree on the amount of the damage, is it none the less necessary that the owner of the vessel should go to a court and sue?

Mr. LITTAUER. The character of the proceeding which the gentleman has just described is the usual one that prevailed in the past. It was customary, under Treasury regulations authorized by law, to hold a board of inquiry. The naval officers appointed on this board decide on the amount of the damage, also whether the responsibility for the damage was the cause of the action of the Government vessel. Such report was submitted to Congress. When these collisions were but few the Committee on Appropriations considered them; but they amount now to so many cases that the committee called the attention of Congress to this sort of settlement, and asked Congress to remedy this course of procedure by legislation. No action was taken thereon, and consequently we submit the present provision.

Mr. PARSONS. Why should the owner of the vessel be put to all the trouble of going to the courts when the officers of the Government and he agree the Government was at fault and they agree on the amount of damage?

Mr. LITTAUER. Then it would come before the Court of Claims, and you know what a graveyard that is. There is no provision whereby such claims can be paid under any authority of law; consequently such damage claims—collision claims—are submitted to our Committee on Claims for favorable Congressional action, if it can be had.

Mr. ROBERTS. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTS. Does not the gentleman think it good policy to broaden this legislation a little more, so as to cover all claims that may arise from damage by naval vessels?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think so. I fear the provision we have inserted here may draw forth severe criticism. It was the very best that we knew how to formulate. It surely is a step in the right direction and makes provision for proper consideration. I hope that in another year we may successfully submit a much broader provision for the disposal of claims in general, wherein the Government, through its officers, after examination, reports to Congress its determination that we owe a just debt because of some emergency, and that this conclusion be framed with authority of law that it can be considered by the House without going through all the machinery of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I take it that the provisions increasing the appropriation for the Internal-Revenue Service, referred to on pages 7 and 8, are because of the passage of the sweet-wine law?

Mr. LITTAUER. That is the reason.

Mr. NEEDHAM. That is the reason I asked the question

Mr. LITTAUER. I will state to the gentleman from California that the additional amounts inserted here were because of recommendations submitted by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who declared that these amounts would be necessary because of the passage of the law referred to, and that the additional provision here made is ample for the purpose.

Mr. NEEDHAM. It was his recommendation that there be $85,000. You have one provision here of $60,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. And another one of $25,000.

Mr. NEEDHAM. But you make no provision there as to the fiscal year. Ought there not to be a provision here for 1907? Ought not the provision in lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 8, refer to the fiscal year 1907, the same as the provision in lines 9 to 12, on the same page?

Mr. LITTAUER. If the gentleman will reserve that inquiry until the item is reached in the bill, I think I can give him a proper answer, while at the present I would not be able to do so definitely.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman have any objection to having an amendment to the bill carrying those items in the omnibus light-house bill which are not carried in the sundry civil bill to, at least, a reasonable amount of the authorization?

Mr. LITTAUER. I am not acquainted with the items. I know there were a number of items submitted to us for the repair and rebuilding of light-houses and keepers' houses that were omitted from this bill because they had been included in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there was an omnibus light-house bill passed through this House that became a law recently, carrying about nineteen hundred thousand dollars altogether, and a portion of those items were put in the sundry civil bill in the Senate, the sundry civil bill having passed the House before the light-house bill became a law. But a portion of those items, which are needed very much, were not put in the sundry civil bill in the Senate, which, instead of inserting those, inserted some not authorized by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are these authorized by law?

Mr. MANN. These are authorized by law.

Mr. LITTAUER. If authorized by law, why can not the gentleman submit an amendment at the proper time?

Mr. MANN. I propose to see that an amendment is submitted. But I ask the gentleman whether he had considered or whether he would resist such an amendment?

Mr. LITTAUER. I certainly would not if the gentleman would state his reasons therefor, and they are not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. They are not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, gentlemen, if you will return to the report submitted in connection with this bill, you will find the various totals of appropriation for each Department, and also the chief items thereunder. I called your attention to the fact that the bill carries specific items aggregating ten millions and a quarter, but that does not properly represent the total amount that this bill will withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, because included in this bill is a judgment of the Cherokee Nation of $1,111,284.70 rendered by the Court of Claims, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, which carries with it interest at the rate of 5 per cent from June 12, 1838, which will require an additional expenditure of between $3,700,000 and $4,000,000. It is the consummation of neglect of Congress to pay what has been declared to be a just debt of the Government to the Cherokee Indians—a debt which has been permitted to run along year after year until in the very last days of the Fifty-seventh Congress action was taken which resulted in the decree which I have referred to, carrying such an enormous amount of interest.

Another item which it is proper I should refer to is one of $375,418.94, to reimburse the State of Texas in accordance with the provisions of the deficiency bill passed in the last day of the last Congress, approved March 3, 1905. The provision reads as follows:

> The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and report to Congress for its consideration what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, for payment of State volunteers or rangers, called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States.

The Secretary of War, in accordance with the provision, reports to Congress the amount so expended was $375,418.94, and no evidence has been found showing that the State of Texas was reimbursed out of the Treasury of the United States for any of the expenditure included in that amount. Your Committee on Appropriations, considering the character of the legislation which called for this report, believed the insertion of this item in the bill was required.

Now, of the ten millions and a quarter submitted in this bill, three millions and a half is required to pay judgments and claims passed to us from the courts. Three million dollars is necessary to be added to the permanent annual appropriation for the administration of the customs laws. Gentlemen will remember that an annual appropriation is made in two semi-annual parts of $2,750,000. The Comptroller of the Treasury has declared that the appropriation for the second half is not available during the first half of the year, and consequently it is necessary to anticipate at this time an annual deficiency of $3,000,000. Add to these items $2,000,000 for the San Francisco disaster, and we have a total of eight millions and a half out of ten millions and a quarter carried in this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not understand the statement about the Cherokee claim. I see the appropriation for it is $1,134,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. And if the gentleman will read along a little further he will notice "and such claim for interest as may be found to be due in accordance with the decree of the court."

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not necessary in this appropriation bill to state the whole amount? The bill, then, is not merely for ten millions, but for fourteen millions?

Mr. LITTAUER. The bill will actually withdraw from the United States Treasury $14,250,000. The sum had to be left indefinite because the computation of interest had not yet been made. Moreover, the decree declares that interest shall run until the amount is paid, and makes provision that the amount shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall be its distributer and recognize certain claims of attorneys.

Mr. PERKINS. Is $14,000,000 really the total amount of the bill, or are there some other items that do not appear?

Mr. LITTAUER. There is one other item, an adjudicated claim in connection with the District of Columbia, of $66,000, that carries interest; but it is inconsequential in amount.

Mr. PERKINS. No other large item that does not appear?

Mr. LITTAUER. None other. Mr. Chairman, because of a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, it has become urgently necessary to ratify and legalize the collection of duties, export and import, collected in the Philippine Islands by the provisional military government established by President McKinley, continued under President Roosevelt, prior to March 8, 1902, the date when Congress passed the first Philippine tariff act. Congress shortly thereafter passed a law, approved July 1, 1902, in which it was supposed that duties collected prior to March 8 of that year had been ratified. But before the passage of that act suit had been brought in the Court of Claims to cover duties paid between the ratification of the peace treaty, in April, 1899, and March, 1902, the date when the first Philippine tariff act was passed. The United States, in defending those suits, took the ground that a state of war existed which justified the imposition of these tariff duties as a military exaction, and that they were ratified by the act of July 1, 1902. But the Supreme Court, in a recent decision, has decreed that the act of July 1, 1902, did not ratify and confirm the duties collected between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, because by its terms it only ratified duties collected in pursuance of the Executive order of President McKinley of July 12, 1898, the war provision, and its amendments. The language of this law was most unfortunate. The Supreme Court decreed that the order could be effective only during the war with Spain, and in consequence the amendments could apply only during the same period, so that duties collected after the treaty of peace could not be said to be collected in pursuance of that order and its amendments, and were therefore not by law within the ratification of the act of July 1, 1902.

There is grave danger that under this decision a myriad of claims, amounting to at least $15,000,000, not only for duties collected on goods going into the Philippine Islands from the United States, but from foreign countries, may be saddled onto the United States for payment, and to reimburse persons who had already reimbursed themselves for the duties they paid in the prices at which they sold their imported and exported merchandise. There is not the slightest equity in favor of these claims, and it is but right and just that Congress prevent such collection by curative legislation. The Supreme Court has expressly upheld the power of Congress to so ratify tariff duties originally collected without authority of law. The amendment proposed in this bill will ratify the duties collected. Of course it can not invalidate judgments already entered. It will affect pending causes, and will and ought to affect the myriad of claims that will be filed hereafter. Your committee were impressed with the belief that the proposed provision is valid in law; but if it is not valid, then the claims will not be affected injuriously by it. If, however, this provision is within the power of Congress, there is not the slightest doubt of our duty to protect the Government against such inequitable claims by some curative legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I see that the bill provides for duties on goods imported into the islands, and also on goods exported. Are there export duties?

Mr. LITTAUER. There were.

Mr. PERKINS. On goods that were sent out from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LITTAUER. There were.

Mr. PERKINS. At that time?

Mr. LITTAUER. At that time.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York from what document he has been reading?

Mr. LITTAUER. I was reading an extract I had made from a document that had been submitted to me, reviewing the standing of these claims.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Submitted by an officer of the Government?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was a private letter—I believe it would be so considered—a private letter from the Secretary of War to a Member of Congress, not to myself.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I did not suppose there was anything confidential in it. That was why I asked the question. Now, may I ask whether it is the intention of the framers of this legislation to affect the interests of those who have already brought suit for a refund of these duties?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is. It would affect all pending suits. Of course it could not affect judgments already entered; and I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if he will reserve discussion of this matter until the bill is finished—for I believe it will lead to a considerable discussion—it is my purpose to ask unanimous consent to pass it over without prejudice until it is reached on page 4, reserving the discussion until the bill has been completely read.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman now that I shall object to its being passed over, so that the gentleman may understand that it will have to be considered when it is reached. But I think it is just as well to bring out in advance the scope of the proposed act. I take it that it is the purpose of this act to defeat the right to recover back taxes illegally paid, not only of those who have brought suits which have not been prosecuted to judgment, but also of those persons who have paid taxes and have not yet brought suits. Is that statement correct?

Mr. LITTAUER. That statement is unquestionably correct, and we believe it is based upon proper equity.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I want to ask, further, if it is not a fact that only two suits have been brought for the refunding of these taxes, and whether other suits were not brought because of an agreement with the Solicitor-General that these two suits should be regarded as test cases, and therefore there would be no necessity of filing claims in the other cases?

Mr. LITTAUER. I never heard of any such agreement, nor do I know whether the Solicitor had a right to enter into any such agreement.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. There is no question about the right of the Solicitor to make such an agreement, it seems to me; but I asked the question simply because one of the attorneys for the claimants—John G. Carlisle—made a statement in his brief which indicates that such an agreement was made between these claimants and the Attorney-General's Department.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me an answer?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Has the Assistant Attorney-General or the Attorney-General himself the power and authority to enter into an agreement of that kind and thereby bind the Government of the United States?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I think there is no question of his power to have certain cases treated as test cases. He could not compel the claimants to wait; but I think there is no question of his power to make an agreement that certain cases shall be treated as test cases, which cases involve the same principles and are on all fours with the other cases.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman claim that the Attorney-General or any attorney could make an agreement where an action had not been brought that would, for instance, waive the statute of limitations against the claimant?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No; I do not think he would have that power; but I do not think any claimant would be foolish enough to allow the statute of limitations to dispose of his rights. I assume that if such an agreement were made before the statute operated as a bar the claimant would inform the Attorney-General and begin his action. I think it is within the gentleman's own experience that attorneys have agreed that certain cases should be test cases. The question is not whether his action should bind Congress; we know it could not; but there is a question involved in it that is a question of honor. If these claimants were given the understanding that the cases before the courts would be decisive of the other cases which later might be brought and judgment entered upon them without a trial, and then Congress should legislate so as to defeat the right of the claimant who thus waited, I should say that that would be a state of facts which might invite criticism and which Members of Congress ought to be apprised of.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S 4403) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved March 3, 1903, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DILLINGAM, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. MCLAURIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. PENROSE, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. CLAY members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the post-office appropriation bill of the present session, to investigate, consider, and report, by bill or otherwise, to Congress regarding mail matter of the second class.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest this: Suppose a number of these cases were brought in the Court of Claims and the Solicitor-General and attorneys for the claimant agreed that one or two of them should be carried right through to the United States Supreme Court in order to establish the law. Suppose meanwhile the others should be held in abeyance, does not the gentleman from New York think that the Solicitor-General would have power to make that agreement?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the answer to the gentleman is plain and familiar to any lawyer. Where actions have actually been brought—where, for instance, twenty claimants have brought twenty different suits and the attorney appears for the defendant in all the twenty actions, he, of course, has the power and often does agree that one case shall be tried, and by that trial shall the decision in the other nineteen actions that have been brought be decided. But to say that any lawyer for the Government or for any private party has the power to make an agreement where no action has been brought by the man at all, where there is no proceeding in court, where the party has not taken any step to secure his rights, to say to him, "You needn't sue, you needn't bring any action"—there is no attorney, no action—but some time in the future he says, "You may bring your suit and my client will not plead the statute of limitations or any other right he may have," is of course a claim that no client could make.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

RAILWAY RATE REGULATION.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the message from the Senate on the rate bill, and ask unanimous consent that the House consider it at this time and do further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and consent to the request of the Senate for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent, without the Committee of the Whole formally rising at this time, to consider the bill referred to with the Senate amendments, and that the House do further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if we can not go on now with the reading of the bill at this time?

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would think it most desirable that the committee proceed now with the reading of the bill, and I would state that when items requiring full discussion are reached we will not in any way try to limit debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the understanding on this side of the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. As long as the discussion has been brought up in regard to these Philippine claims, I desire to now read, if the gentleman will permit, a short statement in regard to the agreement or understanding that was had to the effect that two cases be considered as test cases for all the others. It will take only a minute or two to do so. I read from a brief touching the matter prepared by John G. Carlisle, counsel in said cases:

It so happens that only two cases were actually before the Supreme Court—the Warner Barnes case, which involves some $71,000, and the Lincoln case, which involves about $700. Following a well-established precedent with respect to all claims for the recovery of taxes unlawfully exacted, counsel filed all their claims in time to save the bar of the statute of limitations, and then by agreement with counsel for the Government took these cases to the Supreme Court as test cases. Counsel might otherwise have had judgments entered in all the cases dismissing the petitions, and then have appealed on all the cases to the Supreme Court and had that court reverse the judgments below in all the cases, and directed judgments to be issued in conformity with the opinion. This, however, would have thrown an utterly useless amount of labor both upon the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court. No practical good which counsel could have foreseen would have been accomplished by entering a hundred judgments in identical form, taking a hundred additional appeals, and entering a hundred judgments of reversal. The course which was followed has always been adopted and is the only reasonable and sensible course to pursue under similar circumstances; having been adopted in these cases by agreement with the Government's representative, good faith requires that the result should not be disturbed by legislative enactment.

While the other cases were not actually on the docket of the Supreme Court, yet the Attorney-General, upon the petition for rehearing in the statement to which we have alluded, told the court that the other claims pending in the Court of Claims, amounting to over $3,000,000, all depended upon the decision in the Warner Barnes case.

I think it important that that statement of the Government's agreement should go into the RECORD at this time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, with the understanding with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] in charge of the bill that when specific cases come up which our side or the gentleman's side wishes to discuss discussion may then be had, I think we better go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. There will be ample time given and no attempt made to limit debate on any matter in connection with items carried in this bill referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, when the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration and the attempt was made to have some general debate on that bill, we were assured that if we would hurry through with it we would have time upon the general deficiency bill. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] gave us that assurance. I do not want, if I can help it, to see general debate cut off in this manner. Several gentlemen on this side of the Chamber wish time, as, for instance, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and several others. I hope the debate will be allowed to run on a while longer. I would be willing, if the gentleman will give me two hours on this side, to then close the general debate.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has referred to the statement that I made at the beginning of the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, I will say that I did make the statement that when the general deficiency bill was reported to the House there would, in all probability, be ample time for general debate, for the reason that that bill would unquestionably be held in the House until the light of adjournment could be seen at the other end of the Capitol. At the present time I think every Member of the House is beginning to see the end of this session, provided we can proceed with the consideration of the appropriation bill that is now before the committee. I also stated at that time that following the sundry civil bill would be the amendment to the administrative tariff act, on which there would be general debate. That bill is now before the House——

Mr. WILLIAMS. With three hours at night.

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And general debate is being had on that bill, and I feel confident that ample time will be afforded to every man who wants to make a political speech during the consideration of that bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's confidence upon that question is misplaced. We will get three hours at night for general debate—one and a half hours to a side upon that bill. If we adjourn Friday or Saturday that means only that many nights—to-night, Wednesday and Thursday and possibly Friday—and that will not mean by any means the amount of debate that is absolutely necessary, if requests are complied with. Now, I ask the gentleman to permit the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] to have an hour now. I will not ask any other time to-day.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Mississippi interrupted me, I was about to say, notwithstanding the statement I made and assurances I gave to the other side of the House as to the opportunities for debate in the remainder of the session, the gentleman from Mississippi refused to grant the consent that was asked for, and forced me to move that the committee rise and go into the House to close debate by motion; therefore if there was any statement made by me regarding the matter it was not accepted by the gentleman from Mississippi at that time. He is therefore not entitled to the consideration now that he otherwise would be entitled to had he accepted my statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, because I did not make any bargain with the gentleman, then what the gentleman held forth as a promise to our ear does not go?

Mr. TAWNEY. No; in other words, because you then refused to accept the proposition which I then offered——

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it seems I have been justified in what I thought——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). You forced us to adopt the plan which deprives you of consideration now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; but "let the dead past bury its dead," in the words of a poet, who was not a philosopher, because the dead can never bury itself nor anything else. I ask now that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] have an hour.

Mr. LITTAUER. Do you mean by that, when that hour has been exhausted the general debate on this bill shall end?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am willing that all general debate shall then end, or the Republican side shall have an additional hour and then end.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the minority member, or minority members of the committee, reporting this bill did not ask this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was stated nobody wanted time, but gentlemen do want time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do we want time to discuss the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest the gentleman give an hour to this side, and we will get through more quickly and happily.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill I have had no application for time. I asked Mr. BRUNDIDGE, the other member, if he had, and he said no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But they came to me, and I have applications for ten hours. The habit is to come to me for time for political debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I agreed with the gentleman in charge of the bill that, providing discussion could be had on this side of the House on certain paragraphs in the bill, that we were ready to have the bill read. That is the agreement. But we get more than an hour; we get more than two hours under the arrangement we made.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Mississippi should understand that an agreement has already been made between the minority member on the subcommittee in charge of the bill on his side of the House and the gentleman in charge of the bill on this side to close debate and go on with the reading of the bill. Now, does he desire to disturb that agreement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I certainly do desire to disturb that agreement. As a Member of this House, under these circumstances I for one can not consent to the agreement. Now, I will again ask the gentleman to agree with me to give the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] an hour.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Let me make this statement for a moment. It is true I stated, as a minority member, to the gentleman from New York that I did not desire to discuss this subject, because it had been explained; but the gentleman will recall the fact that on yesterday I went to him and made the request for time for general debate, mentioning the name of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] as one gentleman who desired to speak.

Mr. LITTAUER. Positively so; and my answer was we desired at this late day in the session not to have any general debate on this bill, but there would be opportunity in the evening sessions for general debate——

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. And for that reason the request was declined, and no time for debate on this bill would be allowed. It is true I have stated to the gentleman that so far as I was personally concerned I did not desire to discuss this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Our desire is to get through with this bill as rapidly as we can, and if the suggestion of the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can assure him that if he will give the gentleman from Missouri an hour, he will get through just as rapidly.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill close in two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE] and the other hour by myself, if I desire to occupy so much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] asks that general debate on the pending bill be closed in two hours, one hour to be controlled by himself and the other hour by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour, or so much thereof as he may desire, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the tariff has always been a perplexing question to the people of the United States and a subject of contention between political parties. There are, and ever have been, two theories on the subject, differing in the purpose for which customs duties can be properly levied and the scope and rate of taxation. The Democratic party teaches the equality of tax burdens, and demands that the rates shall be fixed so as to produce the revenue necessary to meet the just demands of the Government. The Republican party insists that the customs duty should be laid primarily to protect the American manufacturer from the competition of foreign-made goods, and, at the same time, provide the Government's revenue. In effect, the Democratic party is for low tariff and the Republican party for a high tariff. One is an organization that would lay tribute upon certain industries and commodities to uphold the Government, and, to that extent, protect the manufacturer against his foreign competitor. The other party would protect the manufacturer against competitors from other countries and incidentally raise the revenue to meet the financial demands of the Government.

In nearly every address made thus far during this session by Republican speakers reference has been made to existing prosperity and an attempt has been made to create the impression that whatever of material advancement there may be it is due to Republican ascendency. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS], in his attractive address made several days since, compared present conditions with those of 1893 and then remarked that it had been his good fortune to travel all over New England in the last few years and that "it is now one continuous hive of industry." No prosperity is genuine that does not come to all the people. The census of the United States shows that, with one exception, the New England States were not worth as much in farms and farm values in 1900 as in the year 1880. This industry is the foundation of all others and the country can not be considered truly prosperous unless the farmer shares in that prosperity.

I submit herewith a table showing the value of all farm property, including the land, both in 1880 and 1900 in a number of the States:

Does this look like extraordinary progress, when in the great manufacturing districts of the Northeast the farms are growing poorer instead of richer?

The gentleman from Indiana, with dramatic effect, told of the country being insolvent and bankrupt, with an empty Treasury and industries idle from 1893 to 1897, and of the visit of Coxey's army. It might be well now, instead of reference to the small Coxey army of May, 1894, to heed the demands of organized labor. It is here now, as every one knows, several millions strong pleading for legislation through its representatives. It insists upon an anti-injunction law, pleading for an eight-hour law, and other important measures, but this House, under the powers that control, is prohibited from consideration of such bills and denied the right to vote thereon.

You may not be aware that in the decade from 1890 to 1900 there was less decrease by $225,000,000 in the territory heretofore alluded to than in the one from 1880 to 1890 in agricultural wealth. He did not inform you, but of course he knew it, that there was greater material development and general increase of wealth in the decade covering that period of horror and despair which he describes as "the Grover Cleveland period" than in the decade preceding. It is argued that money is plentiful, and that bank deposits are greater than ever before, that money can be found for investment on every hand; but has it occurred to the gentleman that with the growth of bank deposits there has been a corresponding increase of bank loans? In other words, that the indebtedness of the people is greater to-day than ever before. There was deposited in the banks of the United States in 1895 $4,921,267,817; in 1905 the sum of $11,350,000,000. I have been unable to secure a complete statement of all the moneys loaned by the various kinds of banks at both periods, but from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the amount loaned by the national banks can be obtained.

There was deposited in the national banks in 1895 $1,736,022,007. In 1905 they had increased to $3,783,658,494, or about the same proportionate increase as in the deposits of all the banks of the country. There was loaned by the national banks in 1895 $2,016,639,536. In 1905 the loans amounted to the enormous sum of $3,899,170,328. The same per cent of the loans to the deposits would indicate that there is now loaned by the banks of the United States $11,690,000,000, an increase of debt to the banks since 1895 of $6,275,000,000, or twice the amount of indebtedness of 1895. This astounding fact led me to make inquiry of the banking conditions in Shelby County, Mo.—a purely agricultural district—the county in which I have the honor to reside. From the sworn statements of the officers of the banks made on April 3, 1895, and November 9, 1905, respectively, I found this condition: There was on deposit in the banks in 1895 $298,453.39, but in the later period it was more than three times as great. It had reached the sum of $1,022,140.79. If this be the test of prosperity, our people are abundantly blessed. On examination of the same statement I find that there was loaned by the banks in 1895 $315,350.70, but I was surprised to learn that the amount loaned by the banks in 1905, had more than trebled, and amounted to $1,007,349.08. There are the same lands in that county in about the same state of cultivation, with personal property only slightly increased in value. Suppose that financial crises should come again and land values decrease to what they were in 1895, what would be the condition of the people? Far worse than in 1895, for there would be the same opportunities for production with three times the debt. May it not be said, on careful examination of past history, that prosperity is due largely to the inflation of prices of lands and fixed property, and that adversity results from the contraction of these values?

It has been repeatedly asserted that a high tariff invariably secures prosperity and that a low tariff always brings adversity. This has been so often stated, and by persons occupying such high stations, that many have been led to accept it as a truth without any investigation of the question. It seems to be forgotten by many that a low-tariff party was responsible for the legislation for nearly seventy years prior to 1860, when the Republican party came into power. Where is the American who is not proud of this Government's growth and achievements prior to the civil war? Who would say that it was not a success? Starting in poverty and overwhelmed by debt, the work of construction began and was continued in a way that was a marvel to the world. The wisest builders of the ages participated in its beginning. It its triumphant march it has secured a relative importance not equaled in the world's history. The Republican can well feel grateful for this Republic and congratulate its early progress. The Democrat can rejoice that his party trained the Government in its youth, and that to-day he is a part of its citizenship. Above it all should be the devotion of the individual to his country and the happy realization that we are equal factors in the heritage and are all the recipients of the blessings of free, civilized, and Christian government. [Applause.]

There has not always been industrial sunshine. There have been the dark days of financial depression. The causes of these crises have not in every case been plainly written. Politicians have repeatedly asserted that hard times have come as a result of the adoption of given political policies, varying according to the views of the party speaking. There have been several marked periods of extreme financial disturbance. Panics beginning in 1837, 1857, 1873, and 1893 were the most disastrous of these crises. In the light of history we may investigate without bias the cause or causes which led to these phenomena. It may be safely asserted that the immediate cause was not the same in each case, but that the remote and primal causes differ but slightly. Some cloudburst of financial wreck started the mighty crisis of industrial depression, and these varied in each crisis.

Mr. Horace White, in speaking of the panic of 1873 in the Fortnightly Review, said:

> The antecedents of this crisis were identical in every other commercial crisis, namely, speculation, the act of buying with a view to selling at a higher price, and overtrading, or the act of buying and selling too much on a given capital.

Edward Everett, in the Mount Vernon papers, expresses the same truth in a different way:

> For speculation carries with it the borrowing of money and overtrading and extensive use of credit.

In speaking of the crisis of 1857, he said:

> If I mistake not, the disaster of 1857 was produced by an enemy more formidable than hostile armies, by a pestilence more deadly than germ or plague, by a visitation more destructive than the frost of spring or the blight of summer. I believe it was caused by a monetary load of debt. The whole country, individuals and communities, trading houses, corporations, town, city, and States, were laboring under a weight of debt. The ordinary business relations of the country were at length arrested and the great instrument usually used to carry them on was broken down.

This is a faithful portrayal of the fundamental causes of all panics and ought to serve as a deterrent to future failure. It is a source of alarm to-day, however, to observe the amount of debt in the country. There never was as much money borrowed as there is to-day. Money is plentiful and is seeking investment. More chances are taken in its use than for many years. More money is deposited in the banks and trust companies than ever before. But more money is loaned by them than at any former period. Measured by the standard of values of 1906, the masses have far more wealth than in 1873 or 1893.

When panic comes again, however, values will decrease, as heretofore, but debt will not, and this inequality will result in ruin in many cases. An obligation easily met in time of expanded credit may serve to wreck an individual in times of depression. It is a curious fact that the year 1836 produced more business than any year prior thereto. The Government revenues were nearly $50,000,000 more, and the nearest approach to it was in 1835. The panic came in 1837, following these years of business activity. The year 1856 was likewise a record breaker and surpassed in export and import any preceding year by nearly $60,000,000, but was followed by the crisis of 1857. Strange as it may appear to him who has not investigated the history, the same business activity preceded the panics of 1873 and 1893. Eighteen hundred and seventy-two surpassed any previous year in its trade by $100,000,000, and 1892 by $125,000,000. Can the cause of panic be seen in the strange fact that the greatest business energy has been seen in the year preceding it? Certainly it will not be found in that phenomenon alone, but it may give a clew to the real cause of these financial crises and serve to corroborate the theory that debt is the true secret. Many have the impression that the export of gold and silver has much to do with financial conditions.

There can be little doubt that large money exportation and no importations would soon impoverish the country, for it would seriously affect the circulating medium. In the four years preceding the crisis of 1837 there was slightly more import of gold and silver than export. But in the periods preceding 1857, 1873, and 1893, there was a large excess in export of both gold and silver. These amounts necessarily came out of the circulating medium and lessened the money available for the demands of commerce. Paradoxical as it may seem, there was more money deposited in the banks in 1836, 1856, 1872, and 1892, respectively, than in any previous years. Apparently there was an abundance of money at each of these crises, but somehow not where it might be used to avert the financial storm. We have no way of determining the debts of individuals, firms, and corporations at these periods of depression; but it is safe to say that the aggregate of obligations had never equaled those of each succeeding crisis, thus carrying out the theory of Mr. Everett that debt was the real explanation.

Some have believed that the revenues and expenditures of the Government would explain the phenomenon, but examination sheds little light on the question. In any case, for several years immediately preceding the crisis there was a large excess of revenue over expenses, as the following table will show:

1853–1856	45,000,000
1889–1892	257,000,000

In times of depression or business stagnation it would be expected that there would be a deficit in revenue, and such has been the case in every like period, showing that the Government, as the individual, feels the stress of these financial crises. It may therefore be truthfully asserted that values were greatest and speculation most extensive in the years prior to these panics.

There are those who believe and charge that commercial crises are due to tariff legislation, and they assert that every panic is properly traceable to a low tariff. Henry Clay, who was the champion of protection, in a speech in the Senate in January, 1837, in protesting against the bill to change the tariff duties, said of the compromise low tariff of 1833, then in existence:

I have risen at once purposely to declare that I shall oppose, so far as my voice and my vote can go, this disturbance of the compromise arrangement made in March, 1833, under which the country has flourished in an unparalleled degree.

The foundation for the statements that are so frequently made by politicians that tariff is responsible for the awful crises of the past is found in the strange writings of one Henry C. Carey. Mr. Taussig, in his Tariff History of the United States, says with reference to the several crises:

The protectionists tell us that the compromise tariff caused the disastrous crisis of 1837 and 1839; that the high tariff of 1842 brought back prosperity; that depression again followed the passage of the act of 1846, and that the panic of 1857 was precipitated by the tariff act of 1857. On the other hand, free traders not infrequently describe the period between 1846 and 1860 as one of exceptional prosperity, due to the low duties then in force. It would not be worth while to allude to some of these assertions if they were not so firmly embedded in current literature and so constantly repeated in many accounts of economic history. This is specially the case with the curious assertion that the crisis of 1837–1839 was caused by the compromise tariff of 1833, or connected with it. This assertion had its origin in the writings of Henry C. Carey, who has been guilty of many curious versions of economic history, but of none more remarkable than this. It may be found in various passages in his works, and from these it has been transferred to the writings of his disciples and to the arguments of protectionist authors and speakers in general. Yet no fair-minded person having even a superficial knowledge of the economic history of these years can entertain such notions. The tariff had nothing whatever to do with them.

In speaking of the panic of 1857 Mr. Taussig says:

We may dispose at this point of a similar assertion occasionally made in relation to the crisis of 1857, that the tariff act of 1857 caused or intensified it. The origin is also traceable probably to Carey. It appears in his writings and in those of his disciples. In fact, the crisis of 1857 was an unusually simple case of active speculation, overtrading, panic, and depression, and it requires the exercise of great ingenuity to connect it in any way with the tariff act.

I believe that I am corroborated by all protectionists in the statement that the panic of 1873 was not produced by the tariff and that the depression that followed up to 1879 was not due at least to the protective tariff then in existence, but he who attributes the crises of 1837, 1857, and 1893 to that source ought to admit that the one in 1873 came from the same source. It is true this would not serve the political purpose, as you can readily see, because the Republican party was then in absolute control of every branch of the Government. What, then, was the cause of the panic of 1873? The same general causes which resulted in the crises of 1837, 1857, and 1893.

Much has been said about people having no employment after the panic of 1893 had begun. Reference is frequently made to Coxey's army and the soup houses of that time. These statements are usually made to deride Democracy, but not to fairly meet any political issue.

Mr. Voltaire, in his writings nearly two hundred years ago, gives a vivid picture of the wild speculative craze prior to a panic, in which he speaks of John Law. He describes him as a gambler and a murderer who conceived the idea of a company which should pay in notes the debts of a state and should reimburse himself by the profits. He established a bank in 1716, and then sold the stock on the theory that the new scheme would produce enormous profits. Riches came to his coffers, the notes circulated profusely, and he became the hero of business venture. He soon turned from Scotsman into Frenchman by naturalization, just as some of our captains of industry now become Englishmen. He changed from a Protestant to a Catholic, as one noted woman has recently done that she might be the Queen of Spain. He abandoned the life of adventure to be lord of most beautiful estates. His arrival in public places was followed by dukes, peers, marshals, and bishops ready to pay him homage. This boom lasted about four years, and then change came, which Voltaire expressed in these words:

Credit fell at once. Nothing could be seen but paper. An actual poverty began to succeed so great imaginary riches.

Professor Nicholson further describes the panic of that time (a description not unlike that which might be made of the crises of 1837, 1857, 1873, and 1893 in this country) in the following graphic way:

A few weeks before the streets were crowded with throngs of people eager to obtain new issues of shares and indulge in the wildest speculation. Money was abundant, and the consumption of wealth most extravagant. Now the approaches to the bank were packed with people driven by hunger and misery to try to exchange their bits of paper, often the reward of hard work, for money with which they might obtain the means of life. On one occasion, on a hot, dark night in July, about 15,000 people were wedged in narrow streets about the bank. When the day broke it was found that fifteen persons had been crushed to death and trampled upon. This, dreadful as it is, perhaps hardly strikes the imagination with such horror as the discovery, in the middle of December, of a house in which the husband had killed his wife and children and hanged himself through destitution, whilst in the very room was found, with two or three half pence, 200,000 livres of bank notes, which at one time would have been worth £10,000.

I have elsewhere called attention to the anomalous conditions before a panic which are very graphically described by Mr. Horace White in 1876, in these words:

The appearance of prosperity immediately preceding the panic is so deceitful, the activity of trade and the upward movement of prices are so exhilarating that the tornado always finds us with every inch of canvas spread. All the ports are open and the crew fast asleep. It is impossible to exaggerate the suffering caused by these financial storms whose vengeance always falls with greatest severity upon those least responsible for them and least able to resist them—the laboring poor. No one can read the story of England's poor immediately following the commercial crisis of 1816 and 1825 without a shudder. Nor were those of America after the crises of 1837 and 1857 any better provided for except as nature had dealt rather more kindly by them. All that man could do had been done to turn them shelterless and penniless into the streets, to become beggars or barbarians, like the Sunderland sailors, the Norwich weavers, and the Bradford wool combers of the mother country.

Few persons are aware how great an obstacle to human progress these oft-recurring shocks to industry really are. We see great houses go down with a crash, but others come to take their places. We see multitudes of operatives thrown out of employment and soup kitchens established and charities set on foot to carry them through the weary time of revulsion. What is not seen is the progress they might make if their savings were not swept away every few years through no fault of their own.

In Johnson's Encyclopædia may be found a portrayal in a few words of the inception and effect of commercial crises:

First, we find a period of speculation, in which every business man strives to extend his operations. Prices are rising, prosperity seems to be increasing, wages are high, and employment steady. Then comes a shock to credit at some weak point in the industrial system; confidence is destroyed, prices begin to fall, business men contract their operations, wages are reduced, and working time reduced still more. General adversity for merchants, capitalists, and laborers alike succeeds the general prosperity of the former period.

The panic of 1837 affected both Great Britain and the United States. In so far as the causes were separate, the same Encyclopædia says of the United States:

The financial causes were to be found in the unsound organization of banks in different parts of the country, not excluding the United States Bank itself. The industrial causes were to be found partly in the overproduction of cotton on a credit basis; partly in the system of internal improvements, which had locked up much capital in works which were not productive, some on account of their incompleteness, some on account of their inherent worthlessness. As long as the speculative fever lasted the unsound concerns were able to support one another, but with the failure of a few the whole commercial fabric went to pieces.

The Bankers' Magazine of November, 1857, in speaking of the panic of that year, says the causes which produced it were the same as those which resulted in the panic of 1837, viz:

Overtrading, undue bank expansion, long credits, excessive importations from Europe, and speculations in public lands.

In Hunt's Magazine of January, 1858, in speaking of the panic then spending its force, which was characterized as "wholesale ruin descended upon them with the rushing speed of a tornado," is found this expression:

What is this disaster which has come upon us, when our resources are so magnificent? Debt, not to foreign countries, but among ourselves, not on the European account, but to one another.

Mr. Grabill, in the American Magazine of Civics in 1896, said:

The crisis of 1857 was similar to that of 1837, but more serious in its effects; that credit was overabundant and loans to be had for the asking; senseless dealing in phantom real estate was repeated; that increased wealth had stimulated men to overdo all kinds of business. The panic was precipitated by the failure of the Ohio Life and Trust Company, which was quickly followed by numerous bank failures.

The panic of 1873 was thus forcefully depicted in the same magazine:

Blind speculation again groped into pitfalls; prices were once more fabulous and again the crash came. This time a Philadelphia banking house was the domino to start the line. The panic was alarmingly sudden and appalling in its effects. Soon again idleness populated the manufactories and hunger the market places. Stagnation and ruin were everywhere.

The American Journal of Politics in 1894, in an article on the cause of panics, gave this explanation of the phenomenon:

A tendency to inflate credit, a tendency to undue hopefulness, a tendency to reckless speculation, and a tendency to undue alarm when disaster is imminent.

The panic of 1873 began with the failure of Jay Cooke & Co.

on September 18, but its oncoming was described in an article in the Fortnightly Review in 1876 in these words:

Phenomena antecedent to the crisis were the usual ones—a rise of prices, great prosperity, large profits, high wages and strikes for higher, crowded thoroughfares, large importations, a railway mania, expanded credits, overtrading, overbuilding, and high living.

James H. Eckels, late Comptroller of the Currency, in discussing the relation of the money question to the panic of 1893 and its effect upon the financial condition of the country in the North American Review, said:

It would be unfair, however, to charge in its entirety the present condition to a single cause. There must be taken into the account as the contributing elements, unwise speculation, great extravagance, and the giving of unlimited credit to those engaged in purely speculative enterprises.

From these expressions of the causes of the several crises of the past there can be no doubt that the same general conditions have prevailed prior to each period of depression; and while the accentuating causes at the particular time may slightly vary, the distress and suffering of the people has been practically the same. It is also manifest that nearly every historical writer, in speaking of the causes of panic, does not even mention the tariff as an indirect or remote cause. In numerous instances, however, specific statement is made that the tariff existing was not responsible for a given panic or crisis.

Mr. Clay, the apostle of protection, in speaking of the tariff act of 1833, said in a speech delivered in the Senate in 1842:

With regard to the operations of this act, it is a great mistake to say that any portion of the embarrassment of the country has resulted from it. Other causes have contributed to this result.

John Sherman, in a speech made in this House in 1857 on the bill to reduce the Walker tariff of 1846, said:

All parties agree to the absolute necessity of reducing the revenue. The danger arising from the accumulation of the coin of the country in the subtreasury can not be overstated. The reduction can only be made in one of two modes, either by enlarging the free list or by a reduction of the rates of duty.

Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, in speaking of the merits of the same bill in the Senate, said of his State:

Her merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and business men in all the departments of a varied industry want action now, before the Thirty-fourth Congress passes away. They are for the reduction of the revenue to the actual wants of an economical administration of the Government.

Mr. Blaine, in his Twenty Years of Congress, in speaking of the effect of the tariff of 1846, said:

The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846 seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people, but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented Presidential candidates.

There was a Democratic tariff in 1837 and 1857 and a Republican tariff in 1873 and 1893. Some protectionists seek to charge the panic of 1893 to the Democracy and its ideas on the tariff, but no one can question the fact that the McKinley tariff remained as the law of the land for fifteen months after the panic had been upon the people and until its most disastrous effects in business failure had passed. I can not understand why the truth should not be frankly stated—that the tariff was not responsible for that panic. If Mr. Harrison had been elected in 1892, there would have been the panic of 1893, and if the Democracy had been victorious in 1872, there would have been the panic of 1873; the election of a Democratic President could not have prevented it.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Shaw, in his speech at St. Louis a few weeks ago, opening the campaign there, made this statement:

Is there a farmer in Missouri with so poor a memory as to have forgotten 1894, when we consumed 45 per cent less wheat per capita than we did in 1892?

Thereby conveying the information, as it would seem, that there was wholesale starvation in 1894. I am grateful that starvation has never come to this Republic; whether Democrats or Republicans were in control, whether protection for protection's sake or tariff for revenue was the dominant policy, plenty has been found on which to subsist, and the gaunt specter of famine has not confronted the people. [Applause.] The Government statistics show that in 1892 there were 612,000,000 bushels of wheat produced, 226,000,000 bushels were exported, leaving for domestic consumption 368,000,000 bushels. If this had all been used by the people, it would have been nearly 6 bushels for each person. But who would say that many bushels were actually consumed? In 1894, the date to which Mr. Shaw refers, the same statistics show that there were produced only 396,000,000 bushels of wheat, that there were exported 164,000,000 bushels, which left for home consumption 232,000,000 bushels, or not quite 3½ bushels per capita. This is correctly stated to be nearly 45 per cent less than in 1892. But will any-one contend that no more wheat was consumed in 1894 per capita than the 3½ bushels? If Mr. Shaw did not mean to mislead; if he were concerned to tell the whole truth, why did he not explain that there was 45 per cent more wheat consumed in 1896, as gathered from the same statistics, under the Wilson tariff than there was in 1894 under the McKinley tariff? Then, as if to clinch the story by the memory of the farmer, he stated:

Is there a farmer in Missouri who does not feel the difference between the consumption of more than 6 bushels per capita as against 3½ bushels per capita during 1894?

As much as to say how grateful the people should feel since they have enough wheat to eat and to spare. How many can remember the hunger and scarcity of bread in 1901, when the per capita consumption of wheat was more than 2 bushels less than it was in 1899 and more than 60 per cent less than it was in the next year, 1902? Some one may say you are mistaken; 1901 was a year of plenty. So it was; but by the same reasoning and similar proof as Mr. Shaw uses I have proven it to be a year of famine and suffering for bread.

Secretary Shaw said in his speech made at Youngstown, Ohio, last October, in addressing himself to the tariff:

Never in recent years has there been a period of low tariff that has not resulted in less importations, nor a period of high tariff that has not resulted in large importations.

Then later on he said:

I expect to be called to account for these utterances and must therefore furnish the proof.

For the four fiscal years prior to the operation of the Wilson-Gorman law we imported for consumption an average of $12.21 per capita.

During the next four years we imported only $10.81 per capita, a loss of over $1 per capita.

How unfair this comparison, because it includes a period of panic; but let us examine it and see what is really proven.

The four years prior to the Wilson-Gorman law, with their imports per capita, were as follows:

These he classes as years of protection. They were under the McKinley tariff act, and instead of an increase in importations during that period there was actually a decrease of $3.97 per capita between 1891 and 1894, proving beyond question that his statement that high tariff brought large importations is incorrect.

Now, as to the other four years to which he refers, which covers the period of the operation of the Wilson-Gorman law and one year beyond it, the importations per capita were:

The Wilson-Gorman law went into effect August 28, 1894, and remained in force until the Dingley bill became a law—July 24, 1897—or not quite three years, so that the figures of 1898 belong to the Dingley-law period. What do the figures from 1895 to 1897 show? Do they sustain the contention of the Secretary that importations decreased during the period of the lower tariff? Certainly not; but plainly show the contrary.

But this is drifting somewhat from our investigation. What of the crisis of 1893? Mr. BURTON of Ohio, in his excellent work, "Crises and Depressions," says:

The depression in Europe commenced at the end of the year 1890, a survey of the situation affording strong arguments that it was due in the United States at the same time, but, while the onward movement was checked, the actual crisis was postponed until 1893.

For this he gave as the principal reasons an unusual demand in Europe for food supplies and the inflation of the currency produced by the issuance of silver certificates.

In comparing the crises of 1873 and 1893 Mr. BURTON said:

In many respects the crisis of 1893 was followed by disasters more severe than that of 1873. There was a more rapid decline of imports, particularly of articles of luxury; there was a larger number of bank failures. The decrease in deposits and the withdrawal of money from circulation was continued for a longer time. But it can not be compared with that of 1873 in its intensity or in its continuance.

In the Republican Campaign Handbook of the year 1904, in speaking of the panic of 1873, it is said:

In 1873 the mere failure of one great railroad system not yet completed need not have brought a long period of depression. Recovery should have followed. It did not.

Then, in undertaking to explain the causes of the panic, this language is found, the Democrats carried the House in 1874 and 1876, and their policies and the agitation of their theories "depressed all business and destroyed trade," and that "the country has never known worse years than 1877 and 1878." What a strange suggestion. With a large majority in the Senate and General Grant as President, what should the Republican party fear? Why should they attempt at this late day to throw the responsibility on the Democratic party when they were wholly responsible for the conditions then existing and for more than a year thereafter before an election in which the Democratic party gained only the lower House. Stranger still, in 1878 the Democracy secured a majority in both House and Senate, and in the next year, 1879, the depression passed away, confidence was restored, and prosperity resumed its sway. [Applause.]

I submit herewith a table showing the imports and exports and the amount involved in the failures for the years from 1875 to 1880, both inclusive.

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Failures.
1875	$532,000,000	$560,000,000	$201,000,000
1876	460,000,000	594,000,000	191,000,000
1877	451,000,000	632,000,000	190,000,000
1878	437,000,000	696,000,000	234,000,000
1879	445,000,000	699,000,000	98,000,000
1880	627,000,000	824,000,000	66,000,000

From this table it may be observed that exports greatly increased from the time the Democracy gained control of the House, and was greatest when they controlled both Houses; that imports were nearly one hundred millions greater than they were in 1875, the first year the Democrats had supremacy in the House; that the commercial failures decreased in their aggregate from $201,000,000 in 1875 to $66,000,000 in 1880, and its greatest reduction was in the years when the Democracy was in charge of both branches of Congress. [Applause.] These tables plainly show that there is no ground whatever for the implication that the Democracy was chargeable with the depression from 1873 to 1878. Any candid man ought to concede the truth at once, that neither the Democrats nor the Republicans are wholly responsible for that crisis. But if panics are to be chargeable to political parties, then the one of 1873 should be charged to the Republicans. If the Democrats are charged with the panic of 1873, then, with the same parity of reasoning, there can be no way for the Republican party to escape responsibility for the panic of 1893, for it captured both the House and the Senate by an overwhelming vote in 1894, and has been in power ever since. [Applause.] Not only did the Republican party have both Houses, but the tariff in existence up to August, 1894, was of its own making. These facts demonstrate the truth that the nearer the country has come to the acceptance of Democratic teaching the better has been its condition. [Applause.]

The Republican Handbook of 1904 and campaign orators of the Republican party generally claim as years of Democratic tariff the following periods, from 1790 to 1812, 1817 to 1824, 1834 to 1842, 1846 to 1861, 1895 to 1897, and claim the remaining years as high-tariff periods. It is more in accordance with the truth of history to say that Democracy was responsible for the tariff policy prior to 1860 and the Republican party subsequent thereto. But for the purpose of gaining information on this point let us make inquiry as to the conditions at these several periods. I also ask you to remember the solemn declaration of the last Republican national platform, "A Democratic tariff has always been followed by business adversity, a Republican tariff by business prosperity." [Applause.]

The population from 1790 to 1810 increased from 3,900,000 to 7,240,000, but it may be said that business adversity would not deter the immigrant. The wealth during that period increased from $620,000,000 to $1,100,000,000. Does such an increase indicate a continuous period of adversity? The debt of the United States decreased from seventy-five and a half millions in 1791 to forty-five millions in 1812. Is this evidence of twenty years of decline? The money in circulation increased from twenty-six and a half millions in 1800 to fifty-five millions in 1810. Does that corroborate the Republican contention? The imports and exports, showing the trade with the world, increased from forty-three millions in 1790 to one hundred and fifty-two millions in 1810. The revenues of the Government increased from four and two-fifths millions in 1790 to nine and two-fifths millions in 1810. Why should any man who has regard for the truth of history intimate that these twenty years of our Republic were not crowned with absolute success? Think of the magnificent growth of the young Republic in everything that made for its greatness. Are there any twenty years more marvelous in their achievement than these? Burdened with debt and with less than $160 per capita in property, they began their triumphant march to business prosperity.

In the next decade there came the war of 1812 and with it the necessary war taxes, which were removed in 1816. This period is in no sense a protection era. It was necessary to raise the customs duty to meet the exigencies of war, and the Democratic party, true to its teachings, increased tax burdens because it was necessary to meet the extraordinary demands of the time. The Democratic party has always taught that it was the duty of the Government to meet its legitimate expenses. The war of 1812, with its destruction and discouragement, followed by a financial depression, had come in that period. But the population increased nearly two and a half millions, the wealth of the people four hundred millions, imports and exports were about the same at the end of the period as at the beginning, money in circulation increased $12,000,000, agricultural products increased from thirty-three and a half millions to forty-one and a half millions in value. Manufacture held its own, while cotton increased its product from 340,000 bales to 600,000 bales. Is this not a remarkable showing of recuperation? Would anyone say that the victorious party in the war of 1812, with the Capitol burned, the White House captured, and the country devastated by a foreign foe, that could in less than a decade recoup its losses, regain its strength, and triumph over adverse conditions is a party of adversity or its tariff system a failure? [Applause.]

In the period from 1820 to 1830 there were four years of low tariff and six years of higher tariff. These latter years are claimed as years of great protection. The exports and imports were one hundred and forty-five millions in 1820, one hundred and forty-one millions in 1824, one hundred and thirty-five millions in 1830. The population for the ten years increased 3,200,000, the money in circulation was twenty millions more, the customs receipts were greater by seven millions, the agricultural products increased five and a half millions, and manufactures ten and a half millions. The wealth in 1830 was two and three-quarters billions, an increase of 40 per cent in the decade, and the national debt was reduced nearly one-half. This makes a grand showing, not equal to the first period of twenty years, but an advance in population and national wealth that is gratifying.

In the next census period came the commercial crisis of 1837. The customs duties were made lower in 1833, but the years following up to the panic were fraught with buoyant hopes and unexampled prosperity. The statement for the decade is especially encouraging. The population increased 40 per cent, imports and exports from one hundred and thirty-five millions to two hundred and twenty-two millions, the money in circulation increased from eighty-seven and a half to one hundred and eighty-six and a half millions, the wealth increased over one billion one hundred and fifty millions, bank deposits more than doubled, agricultural products doubled in value, and manufactures increased 70 per cent. This details a record of advancement that one could hardly expect unless he was entirely familiar with the history of those times.

In the next census period occurred the Mexican war. It was a low-tariff period, excepting from 1842 to 1846. This decade made astonishing progress. Population increased 36 per cent; wealth, 80 per cent; money in circulation, 50 per cent; money on deposit in banks, 200 per cent; receipts from customs duties, more than 100 per cent; imports and exports, 44 per cent; manufacture of iron, 150 per cent, and agricultural products, more than $16,000,000. This is a growth that no one could have anticipated. A progress not surpassed in any decade, excepting the one following. The growing Republic had rapidly gained rank among the older nations, and at 60 years of age did one-thirteenth of the commerce of the world. [Applause.]

The last decade of Democratic supremacy was from 1850 to 1860. There was an increase of population of 35 per cent. This is a larger per cent of growth than in any subsequent decade. It increased in wealth from $7,000,136,000 to $16,160,000,000, which was more than 25 per cent greater increase than in any ten-year period since that time. The circulating medium increased 15 per cent. Bank deposits increased 215 per cent, far more than the increase of any subsequent ten-year period. Farms and farm property doubled in value.

In no decade since have they increased 40 per cent. Manufactures increased 85 per cent in their values, a development not equaled since excepting between 1860 and 1870. The imports and exports increased 118 per cent, a growth in trade not even rivaled since except between 1870 and 1880, and in that period there was 36 per cent less increase. A careful examination of the foregoing facts shows clearly that there was greatest progress in material development during the period of lowest tariff. History shows that Democratic supremacy has meant better times and contradicts the statement so recklessly made that Democracy and panic are synonymous terms. [Applause.]

It is charged by some that under low tariff there are low prices to the producer, and that the farmer's success depends upon the carrying out of protective policy. I have made examination of this situation, and the statistics show that the producer in the United States had better prices under Democratic control than at other times. I submit here a table giving the average price of wheat during each tariff period as illustrative of the price conditions at each period, commencing with the year 1817, which is the earliest information I can obtain:

	Per bushel.
1817–1823 (low tariff)	$1.32
1824–1833 (high tariff)	1.05
1834–1841 (low tariff)	1.22
1842–1845 (high tariff)	.96
1846–1860 (low tariff)	1.25
1861–1904 (high tariff)	.94

From the Statistical Abstract and Report of the Labor Bureau it is shown that the wages of labor increased 13 per cent from 1896 to 1904, and that the articles of necessary daily consumption have increased 40 per cent in that period, and that for every $74 in 1896 it is now necessary to have $104 to pay for the same articles of necessary consumption. This statement plainly shows why labor should be concerned for better conditions and why it is so restive at the present time.

As bearing on the question of the effect of the election of Mr. Cleveland in 1892, I submit the statement of R. G. Dun & Co., in their Weekly Review of Trade, on December 31, 1892:

The most prosperous years every known in business closes to-day, but with strongly favorable indications for the future.

The record of commercial failures shows that there were not so many failures in the first quarter of 1893 as there were in the corresponding period of 1892, so that up to April of 1893 there was nothing to show disturbance. In May the cloudburst of panic came. Between April 1, 1893, and July 1, 1894, under the McKinley tariff, the aggregate failures was three hundred and one millions, while in the fifteen months from October 1, 1894, to January 1, 1896, under the Wilson tariff, the amount of failures was $215,000,000, not so much by $85,000,000 as in the last-named period.

Many persons seem to have forgotten that the failures from 1890 to 1893, inclusive, under the McKinley tariff, were more than one hundred millions more than from 1894 to 1897, under the Wilson tariff. They were eight hundred and forty millions under the McKinley tariff and seven hundred and twenty-five millions from 1894 to 1897. Protectionists have referred in derision to the Wilson-Gorman law; but in the three years of its operation it produced in revenue within twenty-five millions as much as was produced in the last three years of the McKinley tariff, notwithstanding the financial depression, and if the income tax had not been declared unconstitutional there would have been a surplus of revenue each year.

In this connection, although not bearing directly on this subject, I wish to call attention to some interesting history. Nearly everyone who remembers the campaign of 1896 and the burden of Republican speeches at that time will recall that a strong plea was made for the life insurance companies by nearly everyone who spoke. A pitiful story was told of the hardships that would accrue to the widow and orphan from a depreciation of the dollar in the payment of losses. The Republican Campaign Yearbook of that year gave the authority on which these statements were based:

"The vast sums that the policyholders of life insurance have loaned, through the cooperation of their agents, namely, the officers who represent the various companies throughout the United States, constitute them a money-lending class. There are 1,496,356 life insurance policies outstanding. A great many people have more than one policy, so that it is probable that the number of this class would be somewhere about 1,200,000. But each policy represents a debt to be scaled, and can be viewed in that line. Some rich men carry a good deal of life insurance; but the vast mass of the insurers are men of ordinary means who thus provide an assurance for their families. The total savings of this form in reserve and surplus as to policies is $1,156,061,796. The face of the policies is far more, but the average savings on each policy is $722.65. And because the people have saved this sum, a little each year through many years, the great free-silver idea proposes to punish them by taking away about $386 from each average value on account of the wickedness of belonging to the money-lending class."

In the light of that history it is interesting now to examine the details of the Armstrong report in New York, and to learn of the liberal contributions that were made by the life insurance companies at that time to the Republican campaign fund. [Applause.] This seems to be the starting point of their active connection with national politics. [Applause.] The average campaign orator did not know in 1896 that his own party at that time was accepting from the insurance companies the hard-earned premiums of the poor policy owner to corrupt and debauch the American voter. [Applause.] I have little doubt that if the insurance companies had kept out of politics Mr. Bryan would have been elected in 1896—a change of less than 20,000 votes at the right places would have elected him. But the Democratic party may well congratulate itself to-day that it has received no part of this corruption fund. [Applause.] The American people have no way of ascertaining what immunity was promised the insurance companies, nor what inducement was offered them for the betrayal of their trust in campaign contributions. But with a Cabinet officer at the head of the Republican national committee, receiving this fund and distributing it, is it any wonder that the President has ceased talking of publicity of campaign receipts and expenses? [Applause.]

It will not be forgotten how boldly and vigorously President Roosevelt a few days before last election denied the charge made by Mr. Parker that the great corporations were contributing largely to the Republican campaign fund. What must have been his chagrin when the proof of Mr. Parker's statement was disclosed through the investigations of the insurance companies made within the last year. In his first outburst of condemnation he is reported to have said that every dollar contributed to the campaign fund must be paid back to the insurance companies; but this has not been done, and the President has long since ceased to discuss the question. How much the world owes to the Armstrong committee for its untiring effort in investigating no man can tell. How much real good has come from the efforts of the governor of Missouri and the Hon. W. D. Vandiver insurance commission and their bold stand in trying to protect the public of that State against the reckless waste and robbery of the accrued earnings of the policy holders will never be revealed; but, as a result of it, presidents and directors of companies, proven to be responsible for this wrongdoing, have resigned, money has been refunded, and general revision of the business methods has been effected. How quickly the insurance companies demanded national regulation and control of their business. How natural this seems to be. Should they feel otherwise than secure in the hands of those who have been the beneficiaries of their wrongdoing? [Applause.]

We are expected to meet the issues of to-day. Past political policy will not satisfy the people. They are concerned about the present environment. The farmers, who in 1860 had one-half the wealth of the country, have less than one-quarter now. They are diligently inquiring why they have not kept pace with the progress of the country. The laborer is looking into labor conditions and demands that he shall have fair distribution of the profit of his toil. On every hand there is distrust. The Republican party need not think it can always belittle Democracy, stand pat for moneyed interests and triumph. The people will see the false pretenses of men high in place and put others in their stead who will carry out their wishes. The time is past, in my judgment, when one man can hide behind a political boss, spurn and disregard the will of the people in doing so, and then expect vindication at the hands of the people for his perfidy. The American people believe in political parties, they are partisans themselves, they commend party loyalty, but they despise the man who will give up his conviction of duty and sacrifice conscience simply to satisfy some man who temporarily swings the gavel of authority.

I have endeavored to show that the Democratic party has a record of achievement and progress which should gratify the heart of every American, and that no man need turn from the page of its history with bowed head. It has made mistakes, it may be. What earthly organization has not? It has been the minority party almost continuously for forty-five years. A party of negation in that time, because it has not had the privilege of directing legislation. It is scoffed at by some, derided by others, sympathized with sometimes, but it is here to remain. Whether the Sixtieth Congress is Democratic or Republican, it is safe to say that many seats will be regained by the Democrats; and whether the next Presidential candidate shall be Mr. Bryan or some other good Democrat, Republican leaders may need to demand again the assistance of the insurance companies, manufacturing and trust magnates, in order to keep the people from asserting their honest conviction at the polls. [Applause.]

In these days of greed and corruption how appropriate are the words of Mr. Lincoln, uttered at the close of the civil war:

Yes, we may congratulate ourselves that this cruel war is nearing to a close. But I see in the near future a crisis arising that unnerves me and causes me to tremble for the safety of my country. As a result of the war corporations have been enthroned, an era of corruption in high places will follow, and the money power of the country will endeavor to prolong its reign by working upon the prejudices of the people until all wealth is aggregated in a few hands and the Republic is destroyed.

I feel at this moment more anxiety for the safety of my country than ever before.

How necessary that every man look to the Government of his country; how important that partisan rancor and individual ambition should be supplanted by true statesmanship; that graft and wrong-doing should give way to righteousness and patriotism, and that the flag of our country should continue to be the emblem of genuine liberty and the token of all that is best and purest in government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, the wise business man at the end of the year or on the completion of an enterprise stops and takes account of stock and considers results. It seems to me not unwise during the last days of this session to pause a moment and review the record of what has been done.

This I believe will be recorded as one of the most important sessions, measured by real benefit to all of the people, that has ever been held by the American Congress. It has not only enacted wise and beneficial legislation, but it has established principles of great and lasting importance. [Applause.]

The Government has been Republican in all of its branches. That party must stand and answer for whatever of good or bad has been accomplished. The minority in Congress may claim credit if it chooses for helping or hindering; but the majority has been sufficient to accomplish what has been done, and every great law has been enacted by votes enough in number to have carried the measure had every Democrat in each House voted against it.

It is due the minority to say it has demonstrated unusual and unexpected statesmanship and patriotism by going with the majority and making some of the votes unanimous, but the result would have been the same had it seen fit to do otherwise.

When the Fifty-ninth Congress assembled in December, 1905, it was presented with some of the most important problems ever offered to the National Legislature.

The Panama Canal, the largest enterprise in the world's history, had been determined upon, but the organization of the ways and means for its construction had not been accomplished. This stupendous undertaking had no precedent in history upon which the Administration could rely for guidance. The great problems of sanitation, labor, and type of canal were not solved when this Congress convened. The President and the Fifty-ninth Congress have solved them now, and the canal is an assured fact and already under construction. The expenses to date have been paid, and provisions have been made for the ensuing year. The money will be expended under laws insuring honesty and economy.

Responding to its duty to promote the general welfare, the Congress under authority of the commerce clause of the Constitution has established by enactment into law the great and all-important principle that public service corporations are corporations for public service, and while sanely and wisely recognizing the necessity of these organizations and the importance of their success, it has served notice upon greedy, avaricious, and unconscionable corporate wealth and power that this is to be a government of law and order, administered for the benefit of all the people. [Applause.]

The bill will, in my judgment, secure to a large degree equality and justice to all.

Do not understand me as saying that the measure will be all that some of its advocates desire or think. But so great and important is the subject, so complex in its nature, and so great a departure in many respects from past methods that it is best to administer the law as enacted, in order to determine what, if any, change shall be made hereafter.

Conceded evils of transportation have existed for many years. Other Congresses, Democratic and Republican, have had opportunities to deal with them. Several Congresses have passed laws regulating carriers, all of which were beneficial, but none of them sufficient to meet the crying needs of the present. It became the privilege of certain Republicans of the Fifty-eighth Congress to press the proposition for regulating interstate carriers upon the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce until that committee was a unit for it. The President, at the beginning of the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress, advocated the legislation. A bill was prepared and passed a Republican House. It failed of consideration by the Senate. The Fifty-ninth Congress, overwhelmingly Republican, prepared through its committee another bill, more far-reaching in its provisions than its predecessor, and this has become to all intents the law of the land. [Applause.]

The Sherman antitrust law, a Republican measure, has been enforced by a Republican Executive until illegal combinations are in great fear and trembling, while some of their constituents are either on the road to the penitentiary or hiding from the officers of justice. Under the leadership of an incorruptible, fearless, and patriotic Republican President, supported by an equally patriotic Republican Congress, a campaign has been made against fraud and corruption in what hitherto has been called "high places," which has given hope and courage to honest men and placed the crown of honor where it belongs, upon the brow of true American manhood. [Applause.]

Corruption and fraud have been no more prevalent during the last few years than they have been for many years theretofore. Indeed, I believe they have been less. The world has been growing better in spite of all the yellow fellows to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.] One of the best indications of improvement is the fact that the criminal is no longer respectable, whether he steals millions or dimes; whether he corners money or directs a mob; whether he sells tainted meats or gives rebates; whether he misappropriates public funds or filches from the individual; whether he be corrupt Senator or defaulting clerk, he is amenable to the law and is brought to justice and branded with his crime. Never in all United States history was the public service cleaner or of a higher standard than now, and this largely because of the awakening of the public conscience to the full realization of the necessity for cleaner public life. [Applause.]

This Administration has not only been fearless in its work and high in its ideals, but it has added to the general prosperity of the people, until this day is bigger and brighter and more glorious in prospect than any other in the world's history. [Applause.]

The work of the present is only limited by the power with which to do it, and this session of Congress has placed within the reach of enterprise a new force. It has handed over to the farmer and the small manufacturer denatured alcohol, and they can use it to perform their work. I am not intoxicated with the illusion of all the benefits which some enthusiasts claim for this new force, but I do believe it will unlock the jaws of the Standard Oil monopoly and relieve industry from its throttling grip. Alcohol sleeps in the refuse of a thousand products, which at present but contaminates the air. The farmer and manufacturer may now awaken the giant, harness it to their machinery, and compel it to serve them. [Applause.]

But these are not all. The House has passed bills in reference to immigration and naturalization. Our country has opened its arms in welcome to the worthy of all nations, but into them have rushed some from across the waters who never can be, and never expect to be, true citizens of the United States. They become the willing tools of designing and corrupt politicians and menace the high standard of American citizenship. This is a country for which hundreds of thousands of patriotic citizens have died. It should be kept for those only, of whatever race or color, who are willing to become wedded to it so long as life shall last and, forsaking all others, shall live and, if need be, die for it. [Applause.]

We are to have a uniform naturalization law, and only those shall be trusted with the sacred rights of citizenship who have proven themselves worthy of it. The wicked, depraved, and dependent, "who have left their country for their country's good," must be denied an entrance to a land already burdened by too many of their ilk.

For years fruitless attempts have been made in the American Congress to curb the selfish and vicious practices of manufacturers and venders of unwholesome and deleterious foods and drugs. This Congress has enacted a law which I verily believe will contribute more to health and happiness than any other act within the last quarter of a century. The nostrum concocter may see his nefarious business vanish, but health will increase, and the people will be stronger in body and purse. The manufacturer of unwholesome food products may be denied his accustomed dividend, but legitimate business will flourish more abundantly, and the people will call their lawmakers blessed.

A new star has been added to Old Glory and its light will shed an increased luster upon the Republic. Oklahoma has perhaps waited long, but her admission at the end of this session has not delayed her entrance into the sisterhood of States. She could not have taken her place any sooner had the act of admission passed last December. She will assume all of the responsibilities and receive all of the blessings of statehood, but she is well prepared, and the Sixtieth Congress will warmly welcome her Senators and Representatives, for they will be wise and patriotic Americans, eminently fitted to aid in shaping the destiny of our common country. [Applause.]

I have not mentioned all that has been done by this Republican Administration. Time forbids that I should do so. I can not tell in detail all of the acts of wisdom and economy which have characterized the proceedings of the last seven months. I am profoundly thankful that I have been permitted to perform my humble part in that splendid work. What has been written has been written, and all of the frantic efforts of men hungry for place and power to belittle or appropriate it will come to naught.

Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, needs no encomium from me. He has already written his name high upon that illustrious roll of fame, along with those of Washington and Lincoln. Washington established the Republic; Lincoln preserved it; Roosevelt has dedicated it anew to the cause of justice and equality. [Applause.] The first two escaped not the calumniator and detractor. No man who has been strong and courageous for the right ever did, but the people, they who make the republics, have crowned him benefactor. Some there have been who have sought to belittle our great President, and have been audacious enough to attack him, but they only bear scars, and 80,000,000 American people have awarded him the victory. He at times may have been impulsive, but the impulse was born of love for the people; he has been strenuous, but the exigencies of the times have demanded it, and it has been the strenuosity of public service. He has done things, and who is there so reckless as to rise here or elsewhere and condemn what he has accomplished? "By his fruits ye shall know him."

I can not close without paying my humble yet sincere tribute of respect and esteem to that distinguished Republican statesman and patriot, the Speaker of this House. [Applause.] He has not only presided with impartial ability over the Congress, but he has been wise in counsel, profound in statesmanship, and is devotedly loved by every Member of this body. Arduous and sometimes difficult and exacting duties have not disturbed his mental or physical powers, and he stands to-day younger than the youngest and stronger than the strongest, "The noblest Roman of us all." Wise, just, and experienced, he has no superior in the minds of those who know him. That God may fulfill the promise of many more years of exalted service to his country is the devout prayer of the American people for JOSEPH G. CANNON. [Applause.]

The country, listening to the sweet music of humming spindles and revolving wheels, gazing on the happy and contented faces of its prosperous people, will recall that all of its prosperity during the last forty years has been under a Republican administration, and that all of its financial, industrial, and commercial distress and suffering have been under a Democratic administration, and with these memories fresh in mind it will say to the Republican party, "Well done, good and faithful servant, continue ye in power." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, we will not take time for further general debate on this side, and I ask that the Clerk begin the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Payment to Germany: To pay to Germany the moiety of the United States of $40,000, in full settlement of the German claims for losses incurred in connection with the disturbances in Samoa in 1899, under the convention between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain of November 7, 1899, as set forth in Senate Document No. 85 of the present session, $20,000.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that section that it is contrary to existing law, that it has never been audited by the proper official in the Treasury Department, and that the claim has never been properly adjudicated. It is unauthorized by existing law and never adjudicated properly.

The facts about that claim are these: During the disturbance in Samoa in 1898 and 1899 certain property of certain citizens was damaged. Great Britain, the United States, and Germany entered into a treaty providing that the question of damages, whether or not there were any damages, and the amount of the damage, if there was any, should be left to an arbitrator. That treaty was signed the 7th of November, 1899. The treaty provided, in substance, that King Oscar of Norway and Sweden should act as arbitrator and pass on the question as to whether any damage had been done, and, if any damage was done, the extent of that damage. Now, in accordance with that convention or treaty——

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman admit that this is an award under a treaty entered into by this Government?

Mr. WEBB. In part; but the gentleman was not authorized by the treaty and the action of the arbitrator to insert the $20,000 in this bill. Now, I was about to get to the point when the gentleman interrupted me. Under that treaty, which, of course, is the highest law we have, King Oscar held an arbitrator's court, with himself as arbitrator. After hearing documentary and other evidence, he decided that the military action in question—to wit, the bringing back of the Malietoans and the distribution to them of arms and ammunition, the bombardment, the military operations on shore, and the stopping of the street traffic—could not be considered as having been warranted, and that therefore His Britannic Majesty's Government and the United States Government were responsible under the convention of the 7th of November, 1899, for losses caused by said military actions, and there was reserved for future decision by him the question as to the extent to which the two Governments, or each of them, might be considered responsible. In other words, King Oscar, the arbitrator, found in his court, as arbitrator under this treaty, that whatever damage there was, the United States and Great Britain are responsible for it. Then he adjourned his court, and has never found what amount of damage was done. While his court was adjourned, and it never has been reconvened, the United States Government upon its own initiative—I suppose by the Secretary of State—and the British Government concluded they would see if they could not settle this matter. The United States Government appointed a man named Crane and the British Government a man named Richards as agents. I believe it was said it was with the consent of King Oscar. That is as far as it goes. Those two agents went into the matter of the extent of this damage. One hundred and eleven thousand dollars' worth of claims from sixty-four claimants were filed before these agents. They were ready to agree that the United States and Great Britain were responsible for $42,000 damages, but the United States Government, by its agent—I suppose the Secretary of State—said "No; we will not pay $42,000; we can cut it down to an amount less than that, because there are a good many claims that are going to be put in here of doubtful merit." And they set to work negotiating with Germany, and finally got Germany to agree to accept $40,000, Great Britain to pay half of it and the United States to pay half.

Now, that was not the action of King Oscar the arbitrator. It was not even the action of the two agents agreed upon, but it was the action of the Secretary of State of the United States and some like agent of Great Britain. These are the facts, as I have gathered them from the communication of Mr. Root, Secretary of State, sent to this committee, and upon that executive communication this committee inserts in this bill $20,000 to pay half of that claim. It has no other basis than the recommendation or the agreement by the Secretary of State. I have stated the facts. It can be clearly seen that this claim has never been adjudicated by King Oscar, who was the arbitrator to settle that question. It has never been adjudicated even by the two agents who Mr. Root says were appointed for that purpose. It has been agreed upon by the executive department of this Government along with the executive department of the Government of Great Britain. It is therefore not in accordance with existing law, and it is not in accordance with this treaty.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman whether he knows if King Oscar confirmed this judgment and agreed to it, after it was made and agreed to by the Secretary of State and the English agent?

Mr. WEBB. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, Mr. Chairman. There is no record of such confirmation. If there were, it might be construed into a judicial act of that arbitrator, but as far as I know there is no record of that kind that can be found, and the arbitrator never ratified $40,000 as the amount due. It certainly is not communicated here by Mr. Root, the Secretary of State. I have given all the facts that Mr. Root communicated to this House. If King Oscar had ratified the agreement of these two agents and had later ratified the act of the Secretary of State and the similar agent of the British Government, then it could be construed into his judgment as if it were the judgment of a court of claims. But there is no such ratification on record, and therefore it is not an adjudicated claim under existing law and is not therefore authorized by existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I am not mistaken, the House on the 5th of this month, under suspension of the rules, passed a bill containing this very identical item with some others, called up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO]. That bill was passed. It has gone to the Senate. It provides for the payment of this identical claim of $20,000. I made the point of order that it was a private bill, but the Speaker overruled me, holding there were three items present in the nature of public claims, and that therefore the bill was entitled to be brought up under suspension of the rules.

Mr. WEBB. Then, that is an additional reason why it should not go in this bill. If it has already been carried in some other appropriation bill, it ought not to be here, and it ought not to be here, because it is not authorized by existing law. There is a department of the Government which audits such claims, and my further contention is that it has never been audited by a proper official of the Treasury Department, and if it had been it would not be a proper charge to go in this bill, because it is contrary to existing law.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this item is before the House as the result of a treaty entered into November 7, 1899. It is recommended for consideration by the Secretary of State as the result of that treaty. His communication to Congress states that it now remains for Congress but to appropriate $20,000 to enable this Government to discharge its conventional obligations. The amount of this claim was settled by an agreement entered into between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, acting in concert, with the Government of Germany, and the sum of $40,000 was the result of that agreement. The convention originally entered into referred the matter for arbitration to the King of Sweden, who sums up his decision as follows:

We are of the opinion that the military action in question—viz, bringing back the Malilitoans, the distribution to them of arms and ammunition, the bombardment, the military operations on shore, and the stoppage of the street traffic—can not be considered as having been warranted; and therefore His Britannic Majesty's Government and the United States Government are responsible, under the convention of the 7th of November, 1899, for losses caused by said military action.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask a question? I understand the claims that are in order under this deficiency bill are judgments and audited accounts. Of course this is not a judgment. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he considers the submission of this claim to the King of Sweden and his finding on the matter an auditing of this account?

Mr. LITTAUER. It would appear to me that, after we had entered into a convention authorized by law, and the result of that convention is a determination by an arbitrator, the award is a proper item for an appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do you consider that a proper audited account?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is such an auditing as makes it, under the rules, proper to be included in this bill.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few observations upon the point of order that has been raised by my friend from North Carolina, and I believe that I can make it perfectly plain that the item is properly in this appropriation bill—that is, no rule of the House is violated by embodying it in this bill. The point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] might be, and for the purposes of my argument will be, divided into two parts. First, that the item is not authorized by law; second, that it has not been properly audited. I contend that it is clearly authorized by the highest law and that it has been audited in accordance with the terms of the law as it has been made by the law-making power. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact admitted by the gentleman who raises the point of order that the convention or treaty entered into between these powers authorized His Majesty King Oscar of Sweden and Norway to determine the liability of the United States and Great Britain on account of what was termed unwarranted military actions in Samoa at certain periods. Now, under this treaty, submitted to the Senate of the United States and ratified by that body, thereby becoming the highest law or the supreme law of the land, as I believe the Constitution terms it, King Oscar, who was by the treaty agreed upon to pass on the issue, under the terms of the convention, declared there was a liability against our Government and Great Britain because of the military action they had taken. This unquestionably fixed our liability, because under the treaty King Oscar was authorized by the treaty to say whether we were liable. Now the only question remaining is whether this claim or liability has been properly audited or not. There can be no question about that, because under the same supreme law of the land—the treaty or convention to which I have alluded—Oscar of Sweden was named as the person who was to determine what extent either Government was bound, or, in other words, was to also audit this claim. No one will deny that the Congress of the United States can by law properly enacted direct any officer of the Government or any other person it may see fit to select to audit an account. No lawyer will controvert this proposition. Under the terms of this treaty, which we all admit is the supreme law of the land, His Majesty King Oscar was seclected as the person to audit this claim. King Oscar first determined the liability of the Government, and then through fiscal agents selected by the parties at interest to ascertain the amount of the liability, whose selection was ratified in advance of their action by King Oscar, audited this claim as directed by law. I will read to you from the report:

The question as to the extent to which the two Governments, or each of them, may be considered responsible for such losses was reserved by His Majesty for a future decision. Subsequently the three Governments, with the consent of the arbitrator, came to an arrangement whereby the claims under the arbitration were to be investigated by United States and British agents to be appointed for the purpose.

Note the language—"With the consent of the arbitrator, came to an arrangement," etc. Hence, you see, these Governments, "with the consent of the arbitrator, came to an arrangement" whereby the claims under the arbitration were to be investigated by the United States and British agents appointed for the purpose. These agents were appointed, their appointment and action in ascertaining the extent of this liability approved in advance by Auditor Oscar, and thus the claim is here, authorized by law, and properly audited by the person authorized by the law to audit same. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this item in this bill is not authorized only by law, but the claim upon which it is based has been audited by the very person directed by the law to audit it.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to say to my friend this claim was considered by the Committee on Claims, was reported to the House, and——

Mr. MILLER. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this matter has already been disposed of by this House, and the House some days ago passed this bill on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO]. It came from the Committee on Claims with a unanimous report——

Mr. BURLESON. But has that bill passed the Senate?

Mr. BARTLETT. I hold in my hand the RECORD of that day, June 5, and it was the bill H. R. 1966, which was called up, as the gentleman stated, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO]. I raised the point of order that it was a private bill on the Private Calendar and could not be passed under suspension of the rules.

The Chair overruled a point of order and gave an elaborate reason for it, and the bill was submitted to the House, and it was passed by a two-thirds vote and has gone to the Senate. Page 8093 of the RECORD will show those facts.

Mr. BURLESON. Has it passed the Senate?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know. If that is true, why should we put it in this bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. I simply wanted to inform the committee of the reason why this item is in this bill. The President, on January 23 of this year, sent a message to Congress referring to this settlement and to the settlement of Danish claims. The message and the documents accompanying it were forwarded to the Committee on Appropriations, and the item was originally included in the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Can I read to the gentleman what the Speaker said with reference to that?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. He said:

One claim in favor of the Empire of Germany, growing out of relations in Samoa. It seems to the Chair, without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the various propositions, after reading the report and the letter from the Secretary of State, that this is a bill properly on the Union Calendar, and not on the Private Calendar, of a class that the House ought to be able to consider under a motion to suspend the rules.

He gave as a reason that it was detrimental to our relations with foreign governments, and was entitled to be called up.

Mr. LITTAUER. And so it is. I simply want to state, as an additional item of information, that the papers in connection with the President's message were read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee has yet no regular information that the House has taken action thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope this claim will stay in the bill, but the question that the House passed a similar bill does not cut any figure as to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. LITTAUER. I thought it was due to this committee to know why the item was still in this bill in spite of the fact that the House had passed the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. You now propose to appropriate $20,000 with which to pay the same claim.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That does not affect the parliamentary situation. It has not become a law.

Mr. WALDO. My understanding of the position of that item is that the Senate has refused to pass the House bill, and that they are going to pass this bill, putting this claim in with two others; and our bill is not going to be passed in the Senate.

Mr. WEBB. Just one word more. I do not think it makes much difference whether this item has been included in other bills or not. The main point for the Chair to decide is whether or not this particular item is in accordance with law. Now, briefly, before I read this particular rule, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER], who is in charge of this bill, and my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will not say to this House that King Oscar, the arbitrator, has ever put his seal of approval upon this $20,000 item; and until he does that it never will become a legal judgment, the payment of which can properly be provided for in this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. He certainly put his seal to the effect that there is an amount due.

Mr. BURLESON. More than that, he ratified in advance the fiscal agent to determine the amount. Consequently that became an auditing of the account under this convention.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, that is not quite in keeping with the facts. He ratified in so far as he agreed with the British and American Governments that they should appoint two agents, but he has never ratified their act, and hence there is no legal judgment. Those two agents, to whose appointments he agreed, found that there were $42,000 due by the two Governments—the United States and Great Britain—and possibly considerably more; and at that stage of the proceedings the Department of State steps in and takes it out of the hands of those two official agents, according to Secretary Root's own statement, and agrees with the German Government as to what should be paid. It is not the action of the two agents at all, but the agreement of an Executive Department. It is not the action of King Oscar, for he has never ratified even the act of the agents, and certainly not of the Secretary of State of this Government. It is the voluntary action of the Secretary of State, and his action is not warranted by any law or treaty, which will not be denied by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer the Chair to a ruling which was made in the Fifty-sixth Congress, where the Chairman of the committee held that the payment of an unadjudicated claim, even though the amount be ascertained—and that was done in this case—and transmitted by the head of an Executive Department, is not in order in a general deficiency bill. That ruling is on all fours with the facts in this case.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman is wholly misinformed in regard to this matter. The whole matter of these claims was settled between the United States, Great Britain has paid her $20,000 to Germany and the amounts in effect, and between the departments of state of these countries it was agreed that these amounts should be due. Great Britain had paid here $20,000 to Germany and the amounts due from her to France and Denmark under that agreement, and the only question remaining is for us to try to be as honest as Great Britain is in paying her debts. Now, as to the question of these not being adjudicated claims. They have been adjudicated under and by treaty. The question of the claims is settled as much as it can be until we pay them.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, a general appropriation bill may carry an appropriation for any object that is authorized by law. In this case the claim was submitted by a treaty of arbitration to the King of Sweden for adjudication. A treaty when ratified is the law of the land. The King of Sweden, acting as a court, decided the question of liability and found that the Government of the United States was liable. The only thing left to ascertain was the amount, and like a court selecting, for instance, a master in chancery, the arbitrator with the consent of the parties appointed agents to ascertain how much was due. Those agents, duly appointed, accredited, and authorized, in their investigation found the sum due, and this appropriation carries that sum. It seems to the Chair that the paragraph is clearly in order, that it is an adjudicated claim, and the amount has been ascertained so as to come within the rule; and the Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the tariff duties, both import and export, imposed by the authorities of the United States or of the provisional military government thereof in the Philippine Islands prior to March 8, 1902, at all ports and places in said islands upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said islands from the United States, or from foreign countries, or exported from said islands, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the collection of all such duties prior to March 8, 1902, is hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same had by prior act of Congress been specifically authorized and directed.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I make the point of order against this paragraph, or I will reserve it in order to give the chairman of the committee or the gentleman in charge of the bill an opportunity to make a statement. I make the point of order on the ground that it is new legislation and not germane to the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I believe the point of order, perhaps, will lie against this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest there seems to be a misunderstanding.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. There was an understanding between the chairman of the committee and myself that when the point of order was made, anticipating that it would be sustained, motion would be made that the committee rise, and when we had gone into the House a rule would be brought in for the purpose of considering this paragraph. It was for that purpose I reserved the point, so as to allow the gentleman to make a statement of the agreement and move that the committee rise.

Mr. DALZELL. I wanted to say that I think, perhaps, it would be in the interest of expedition that we should go on with the consideration of the bill and bring in the rule afterwards, rather than have the committee rise and go into the House and go back again, so that the rule could just as well be presented afterwards as now.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have no power to control the majority, who, if they desire, can bring in the rule at any time.

Mr. DALZELL. I simply rose to give notice.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not withdraw the point of order and save all that time and trouble?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In order that the paragraph may have a standing before this committee?

Mr. KEIFER. Let it be considered now.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. No; I can not withdraw the objection. I believe the legislation would perpetrate an outrage, and I intend to do all I can to prevent it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman propose to pass it without prejudice?

Mr. LITTAUER. I propose to pass this, and at a later hour introduce a rule which will permit the consideration of the subject-matter of the paragraph.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Has not the point of order been sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been sustained and the paragraph has gone out of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 3687 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is repealed, to take effect from and after June 30, 1907; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall, for the fiscal year 1908, and annually thereafter, submit to Congress, in the regular Book of Estimates, detailed estimates of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the committee to the fact that for many years past there has been a requirement that detailed estimates of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs be submitted to Congress, but under the suggested amendment repealing the section whereby provision is made for the expenses of collecting customs by a permanent appropriation has been offered year after year, but not adopted. This submission again seeks to amend the law. I believe it is new legislation, but it is for a very important and proper purpose; and I trust the gentleman may see fit not to insist on his point of order.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair wishes to be addressed on the point of order, I am ready to argue it, but I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to Minnesota: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of Minnesota, for expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities within the State in 1862, under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, and ascertain and determine, under the rules applied in the cases of certain States for expenses in raising and equipping volunteers for the war of the rebellion, the amount actually expended by said State for interest on money borrowed for expenses so incurred and report the amount so ascertained to Congress for consideration.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order, I should like to hear a statement about this item.

Mr. GARRETT. I simply rose to reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this provision is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to reopen and adjust the claim of the State of Minnesota. The principal amount of this claim has already been repaid to the State, but the interest paid on the issue of bonds for this purpose by the State of Minnesota has never been refunded. On some advances made by States the interest has lately been refunded, and this is simply to take similar action with this claim of the State of Minnesota as has been had in the case of other States.

Mr. BURLESON. I should like to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I happened to be in the room when the subcommittee was considering this item, and this is a just claim. Its payment has been long deferred, and I sincerely hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, this claim ought to take the same course as all other State claims. It may be all right. It is a war claim. The Committee on War Claims are examining all these matters carefully, with the aid of the Department. This is no place for it, and I insist on the point of order. Let it take the regular course.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do. This is not a new or a strange provision in an appropriation bill. This sort of legislation has been carried in the general deficiency appropriation bills for several years past. Several of the States, such as New York, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and other States, have had their claims adjusted and reopened by means of this sort of legislation. It seems to me the history of this claim shows that such a bill could fairly carry this item. Under the act of March 3, 1863, the payment of this obligation was originally authorized by Congress. The only difficulty then was there was a limitation of the amount then authorized to be paid by the General Government to the State of $250,000. The State had previously issued its bonds to pay for the support of its troops in the field, and by this act of Congress provision was made to reimburse the State for all such expenses, and out of this $250,000 the principal of the bonds was paid. Now, if there had not been any other disbursements, of course the State would have received the whole of its due, but the interest had not then accrued and did not cease until ten years afterwards, when the bonds matured. By subsequent acts of Congress, following this and referring to this act of 1863, not only were the moneys paid by the State as principal of the bonds paid, but all other disbursements authorized by law, aggregating far more than the original amount provided by the act of 1863.

Thus Congress authorized various disbursements of the State of this nature and other claims to be paid, and thus waived or set aside by its own affirmative act any limitation. But this act of 1863 is the basis for paying those bonds, principal and interest, and it is the basis for the obligation of the United States for the payment of whatever the State lawfully expended under its authority. Now, one of the items paid by the State was this interest of $70,000, which has never been repaid to it. All this item does is to restate and reopen and enable Congress to understand the obligation originally authorized by the act of 1863, of which part has already been paid. That is practically all that is provided by this item, authorizing the readjustment and reopening of the claim, irrespective of the limitation, which had already been waived in several instances by Congress. It does not create a new obligation. All it does is to direct the Treasury to continue the audit of the old one, which has been partially settled in past years, whose justice is admitted, but the exact amount of which is unknown to Congress through its own proper sources of information. Appropriation bills have carried this legislation in past years. It is in the nature of continuing the settlement of an account, which has been under the jurisdiction of Congress through its Appropriation Committees. I hope the points of order will not be insisted upon or sustained.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] or myself first reserved the point of order. I wish to state that on the explanation which has been made, as far as I am concerned, I do not care to insist on the point of order.

Mr. MAHON. I am content.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the fiscal year 1907, being additional to the sum appropriated for this purpose in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for that fiscal year, $60,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to know, Mr. Chairman, whether this is all one paragraph, or separate paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill itself on its face shows the paragraph. Each paragraph on the page is a paragraph in a parliamentary sense.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to reserve a point of order against the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Lines 9 to 12, inclusive?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this paragraph is subject to a point of order. It is simply an increase of an appropriation made for the fiscal year 1907.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, this bill is for deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years.

Mr. LITTAUER. "And for other purposes."

Mr. FITZGERALD. "And for prior years." Now, this is not a deficiency appropriation at all. The fiscal year for which it is intended has not commenced. The rule does not define what shall go into a deficiency bill. This is an anticipated deficiency, and as such, I believe, has been held proper in a deficiency bill. After the Chair refreshes his memory—which I see he is doing—I will be glad to discuss that point.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from New York that this is an appropriation made necessary by the passage of a bill at this session of Congress, and there is no other way whereby Congress can provide for the expenditures except in this bill, which will be the last appropriation bill that will be reported. Now, the fact that it is called a deficiency appropriation does not necessarily make this provision out of order. This Congress has the power to appropriate for this year or next year, in its discretion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has stated information along the line that I am now seeking light upon. I wish to know why the appropriation for the coming fiscal year for this service is proposed to be increased.

Mr. NEEDHAM. I can inform the gentleman. It is because of the passage of the sweet-wine law, which brings in additional revenue of over $100,000 a year. That bill was passed after the legislative, judicial, and executive bill had passed, and it provides for supervision, and these additional agents are required to carry out that law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, and deputy collectors, and surveyors, and clerks in internal-revenue offices, $25,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, on page 8, line 17, I move to amend.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 8, line 17, after the word "officer," insert the following: "being additional to the sum appropriated for this purpose for the year 1907."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

New York, N. Y., rent of old custom-house: For rental of temporary quarters for the accommodation of certain Government officials, $130,600.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read.

Mr. LITTAUER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SULZER. That the paragraph just read is new legislation, and it is not a deficiency, as Congress decided during the last session to strike out this rent provision of $130,600.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is continuing a provision that has been taken care of in previous bills.

Mr. SULZER. Not at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that it is a deficiency. It is an appropriation of money for the rent of the building for the current year, for which no appropriation was made.

Mr. SULZER. This Congress last session refused to pay it. I had it voted out of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman, is not this to pay a claim?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not to pay a claim.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the gentleman to say that this is the same appropriation that was voted out of the sundry civil bill last year, hence it can only be a claim now, and should be sent to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LITTAUER. It went through the sundry civil bill for 1907, but for the current year there has been no appropriation.

Mr. SULZER. This is the same provision the House struck out in the last Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an obligation of the Government, which will have to be met.

Mr. SULZER. Why don't the Standard Oil bank sue for it, if it is an obligation?

Mr. TAWNEY. This year has not yet expired. Now, we are appropriating for rent which the Government of the United States has obligated to pay for the use of this building during the present fiscal year.

Mr. SULZER. But Congress struck out this provision last year. It is not a deficiency.

Mr. TAWNEY. It can not be a claim until the expiration of the year.

Mr. SULZER. It is worse than a claim—it is a steal.

Mr. LITTAUER. This is to meet a provision of law in accordance with a contract entered into by this Government.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, we have heard all about that. I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. This provision is to appropriate money to pay an amount which the Government, under a contract, is to pay for the current fiscal year. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, then I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does it happen that they did not put this in the bill last year?

Mr. SULZER. It was in the bill last year, and on my motion the House struck it out. This matter is thoroughly familiar to most of the Members of this House. It was discussed in detail when the sundry civil bill was recently being debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized on his motion to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is the same old annual scandal, the same old national disgrace, the same old hoary fraud, and I move to strike out of the bill this appropriation for $130,600 to the National City Bank for last year's rental for the old custom-house property in the city of New York. I have made this motion every year since this nefarious transaction was consummated. Last year, on my motion, the same paragraph, the same appropriation, was stricken out of the bill, and it ought to be stricken out again this year. There is absolutely no justification for this appropriation in law or in equity.

Now, sir, I believe that most of the Members of this House are familiar with the facts in connection with this scandalous matter. They remember that in 1899 Lyman J. Gage, then Secretary of the Treasury, entered into an alleged contract with the National City Bank, of the city of New York, to sell the bank the old custom-house property, situate and occupying an entire block in Wall street, for $3,265,000, about one-half the real value of the property. This National City Bank, as is well known, is the Standard Oil bank, and the chief financial agency of "the system."

The Members of this House know all about this bank and the tremendous power it wields in financial and political circles all over this country. This National City Bank is one of the principal depositories for the surplus funds of the Government and has on deposit all the time Government moneys, amounting to millions and millions of dollars, for which it does not pay the people of the United States one single dollar of interest.

Now, sir, shortly after this alleged contract of sale was entered into between the National City Bank and Lyman J. Gage, the Secretary of the Treasury, by which the old custom-house property was sold for $3,265,000, the bank is alleged to have paid the Government, on account of the purchase price, $3,215,000, leaving a balance due the Government of $50,000. The bank paid this money, so it is said, not directly to the Government, but indirectly, by transferring on the books of the bank the amount of $3,215,000 from one account to another account. As a matter of fact, the bank never really parted with one dollar of its money on account of the payment of part of the purchase price, and no deed from the Government to the bank has ever been executed or recorded in the city and county of New York, so that the title to this custom-house property still stands, so far as the records go, in the name of the Government, and yet the Government has been paying every year to the bank, except last year, when the appropriation on my motion was stricken out, $130,600 rental for the use, apparently, of its own property.

This custom-house property occupies one entire block in Wall street, in the city of New York, and is considered one of the most valuable pieces of property in the country. Competent real estate experts estimate its value to-day at over $10,000,000, and the National City Bank will soon get this most desirable piece of property from the Government without practically paying one dollar for it. What a shame! What a fraud on the people! What a steal!

This one-sided agreement between the Government and the bank should never have been made. The whole transaction is one of the most scandalous things in the history of the country. It is an unconscionable contract and can not be justified in law or morals. It is a fraud upon its face, and any court of equity would set it aside.

Now, sir, it further appears that it was understood and agreed between the Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, and the officials of the National City Bank that $50,000 of the purchase price should be retained by the bank and that the deed for the property should not pass or be recorded, in order that the bank should escape the payment of taxes to the city of New York on this most valuable piece of property. It is well known that Government property can not be taxed by a State or by a municipality. I am reliably informed by the officials of the city of New York that the taxes on this property to-day would be about $100,000 a year. The bank now escapes this taxation, and it is an injustice to the people of the city of New York, and yet the bank seeks to compel the Government to pay interest on the purchase price as a rental for the property. Think of this Standard Oil bank charging the Government interest on its own money—rent for its own property. What a farce it all is! It is one of the most outrageous and shocking things that has ever come to my notice. I do not believe that any honest man who will take the trouble to investigate the matter can possibly justify the transaction.

No Member of this House can now vote for this appropriation and ever justify his vote. [Applause.] The whole transaction is a scandalous one, a fraud on the taxpayers of the country, because it deprives them of this valuable piece of property without a dollar of compensation; and it is an outrage on the taxpayers of New York City, because it deprives them of the taxes on the property. The appropriation in the bill for this rental is an outrage, and can not be justified in the face of the honest facts. I intend to get, if I can, a record vote on this steal, so that the people will know how their Representatives vote on this matter.

Now, sir, I object to this appropriation of $130,600 for rent, because the alleged contract is only an agreement to sell, and no title has as yet passed from the Government to the bank, no deed has been delivered, and no deed has been recorded, and the Government should not pay an exorbitant rent for its own property. It is a fraud and a sham, and you all know it. The "System" has been very slick in every phase of this deal. It gets the Government property for nothing, has the use of the people's money without interest, makes the Government pay rent, and beats the city of New York out of the taxes. [Laughter and applause.]

The whole matter is a swindle on the taxpayers of the United States and a fraud on the taxpayers of the city of New York. The Government is cheated out of this valuable property by the National City Bank—the Standard Oil bank—and the fact is that property is worth to-day over $10,000,000. At the same time the bank defrauds the taxpayers of the city of New York out of the taxes and has been defrauding them out of the taxes ever since 1900. There is no use for me now to go into the matter and discuss it at any length. It is the same old story of the same old steal. The Republicans, when the sundry civil bill was before the House recently, voted to pay the National City Bank this $130,600 for next year, and I have no doubt that to-day they are willing to give the Standard Oil Company bank this back rent which this Congress refused to pay last year. Last year the Republicans in Congress were a little more virtuous, apparently, than they are this year, and then most of them could not stand for this swindle. This year, however, in view of the approaching Congressional campaign, they are willing to condone the fraud and vote away the people's money. In all the history of this Government there never was a more flagrant outrage on the people than this sale of the custom-house property in the city of New York. The title of the property still remains in the Government of the United States, and the Government of the United States is compelled to pay rent on its own property, while the National City Bank escapes the payment of taxes to the city of New York. It is a disgrace to the Government, a fraud on the country, and a swindle on the city of New York, and the appropriation ought to be stricken out, and I hope it will be stricken out. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, it is hardly two weeks now since a very full discussion was had on this very subject, and I do not believe the House cares to change the position that it then took by a large vote. I ask for a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that the House would not care to change its position on this item, and as it struck this particular item from the appropriation bill last year, I hope it will not fail to do so this year.

Mr. LITTAUER. The House last year was not the same House that it is now.

Mr. SULZER. Not so far as Republican virtue is concerned. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; it is the same House, the same Republican House.

Mr. SULZER. But it will not be the same House next year if you Republicans keep on voting the people's money to the Standard Oil trust bank. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. But it will not be the same House next year if you Republicans keep on voting the people's money to the Standard Oil trust bank. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is some change in the units, but it is the same House, and the House on full consideration did refuse to vote the rent for this year. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made his speech I examined very carefully the documents he put in the RECORD. The advertisement for the sale of this property merely stated that the purchaser would receive 4 per cent upon that portion of the purchase price that was paid during the occupancy of this property by the Government. Anybody proposing to bid for the purchase of that property, I believe from a fair examination of the papers, would have assumed that the title was to pass to the purchaser at once, and that the earning power of the money paid would be 4 per cent, less the taxes the property would be subjected to by the city of New York.

Regardless of whether the city of New York has been treated properly or improperly, the arrangement that has been made with this bank by which it has been saved the taxes upon the property undoubtedly has given it an undue advantage. In my judgment, if it had been known at the time the bids were made that the title would remain in the Government, so that the purchaser would not be liable for taxes, it would have made a considerable difference in the bids that were submitted. I believe that the scheme has been unfair, to say the least. I do not and can not approve the contract that was made for the sale of this custom-house, and I am unwilling to vote now, as a majority of the House refused to do last year, for this particular item. I hope that for the sake of consistency, at least, the Republican Members of this House will adhere to their former action and reject the item.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, merely for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] a question. The gentleman from New York, as I understand it, states that this matter was fully discussed by the House of Representatives a year ago and this item stricken out on the ground that it was fraudulent.

Mr. LITTAUER. My statement was that it was fully discussed in this House two weeks ago, and that the House retained the item for the year 1907 in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understood the gentleman to say that it was discussed last year and that this was a different House.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] that the assertion was made by his colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that it was stricken out by the House of Representatives, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] said that that action was taken by another House, which was the Fifty-eighth Congress.

Mr. COCKRAN. I wished to ascertain from the gentleman from New York whether he had such an opinion of this House that he believed it would reverse the action of the last House?

Mr. LITTAUER. Decidedly so.

Mr. COCKRAN. Without any particular reason being advanced for it?

Mr. LITTAUER. I think the reasons were very amply given here.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say I think the gentleman is referring to the action of this House two weeks ago——

Mr. COCKRAN. I misapprehended the gentleman——

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). And the House by an overwhelming vote declared in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman said by an overwhelming majority. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. Every Republican except one voted for it and every Democrat voted against it.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were—ayes 58, noes 77.

Mr. SULZER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. LITTAUER, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. SULZER, will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 88.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out $130,600. How much is due on this property?

Mr. SULZER. Fifty thousand dollars is due; that is the amount that is due.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, we certainly can demand of this bank—Mr. Chairman, I move for the present to strike out the last word. I move to insert $80,600 in lieu of $130,600.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out $130,600 and insert $80,600.

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not think I understand this amendment clearly enough to determine whether or not I shall raise the point of order against it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just wait a moment. For the present I move to strike out the last word. I would like to get my amendment prepared. I do not know exactly the figures.

Mr. SULZER. It is $80,600.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I move to strike out $180,600 and insert $80,600.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Change the amount in lines 25 and 26 so as to read "eighty thousand six hundred dollars."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As I understand, the bank owes the United States Government $50,000, balance due for this property. When that amount of money is paid the United States, then this property will be absolutely the bank's, and the Government will have all the purchase money due it. Now, we are indebted to this bank, it seems, and the gentleman from New York says that is a legitimate debt. I think it is a debt that we should not pay. The House has voted twice this session to pay it. Last Congress voted not to pay it at all.

Now, let us pay the bank the balance due it and give a deed to the bank, and then the State of New York and city of New York can tax this property. As the matter now stands it is a nuisance to Congress, it is an outrage upon the Treasury, it stinks in the nostrils of all the people of this country who know the details of it, and it seems to me that we can get rid of it now in this way. We owe them so much, it seems, and they owe us so much. Strike a balance and pay it and let the Secretary of the Treasury then give a deed to the bank, and then the whole thing is over with, and the State of New York can tax it and the city of New York can tax it.

Mr. LITTAUER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption right there, and perhaps save a little time?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Are you aware that the sum of money stated in this bill is for the purpose of paying the rent of the old custom-house?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. Consequently if we reduce this amount you will simply reduce the amount of rent to be paid and which has no relation whatever to the $50,000 due on the contract entered into in pursuance of law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am trying to get rid of that contract by paying it off.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, you can not do it in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can not see why it can not be done. If I owe my friend $50 and he owes me $40 and I pay him $10, we are then even and can walk down Pennsylvania avenue friends.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have submitted a plain, square proposition. I am sick and tired of this matter. I am sick and tired of this outrage, if it is one. If we owe this, let us strike a balance and pay it; if we do not owe it, let us quit talking about it. This is one way to get rid of this nuisance. My amendment is made in perfect good faith, to end this contest. I hope the House will get rid of it. This will give the Government its property and give the bank its property.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES.

That no part of the appropriation for the salaries of members and officers of the legislative assembly, mileage, rent of rooms for the legislature and committees, furniture, stationery, printing, binding, fuel, lights, and incidental expenses appropriated for the expenses of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma by the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, shall be available for any of the foregoing purposes, the said sum being hereby covered into the Treasury; and no election for members of the legislative assembly or for any other officers authorized by the laws of the said Territory or Delegate to Congress shall be held under and in pursuance of said laws in the year 1906; and all persons heretofore elected to any of said offices now serving and performing the duties thereof shall continue to serve in their respective offices and perform all the duties thereof, with all the power and authority conferred upon them by the laws of said Territory, until such offices are terminated by the laws of the State of Oklahoma or until the officers provided for under the constitution of said State are duly elected and qualified: Provided, That in case no constitution is adopted and ratified in accordance with the provisions of an act for the admission of Oklahoma and Indian Territory into the Union as a State, approved June 16, 1906, then said Territorial officers of Oklahoma shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "qualified," in line 2, page 13, insert:

"Provided, That the governor and other appropriate Territorial officers of said Territory are hereby authorized and directed to carry out all contracts with the Territory of Oklahoma for the care and maintenance of charitable and penal institutions, and to make payments therefor out of the general fund of said Territory, and to properly maintain the various Territorial institutions until such time as the constitution and laws of the State of Oklahoma shall provide therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Coroner's office: For amount required to pay the deputy coroner for services during the absence of the coroner, for the fiscal years that follow:

Fiscal year 1906, $255.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that item.

Mr. LITTAUER. There is a law which expressly authorizes the employment of the services of a deputy coroner in the absence of the coroner. It is a provision in the Code of the District.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We had the District appropriation bill under consideration this year and never heard of such an officer as deputy coroner. There is a coroner, the morgue master, an assistant morgue master, and janitor, and that is all. The coroner gets $1,800 a year, and here is $255 to pay somebody for doing his work.

Mr. LITTAUER. Doing the work which under the code he is authorized to receive payment for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is that provision of the code?

Mr. LITTAUER. I have not the code at hand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of my colleague to the fact——

Mr. LITTAUER. I request that the item be passed over and taken up at a subsequent hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] asks unanimous consent that the item be passed at the present time without prejudice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I suggest, in addition to that, the next item against which a point of order will be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fire department: For additional amount required for forage, $1,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, after line 14, insert:

"Fire department: For the following for the fiscal year 1907, as authorized by the act to classify the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1906, namely:

"For chief engineer, $3,500; deputy chief engineer, $2,500; 3 battalion chief engineers, at $2,000 each; fire marshal, $2,000; deputy fire marshal, $1,400; 2 inspectors, at $1,080 each; clerk, $1,400; clerk, $1,200; 29 captains, at $1,400 each; 30 lieutenants, at $1,200 each; superintendent of machinery, $1,400; assistant superintendent of machinery, $1,200; 19 engineers, at $1,150 each; 19 assistant engineers, at $1,100 each; 2 pilots, at $1,150 each; 2 marine engineers, at $1,150 each; 2 assistant marine engineers, at $1,100 each; 30 drivers, at $1,150 each; 30 assistant drivers, at $1,100 each; 168 privates of class 2, at $1,080 each; 30 privates of class 1, at $960 each; and 1 laborer, $480; in all, $427,180, including the sum of $333,560 appropriated in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1907 under the title "Fire department," and in the paragraph for pay of chief engineer and others, which latter sum is hereby reappropriated and diverted from the said act to and for the purposes alone of meeting the requirements of this paragraph for the fiscal year 1907.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For additional amount required to pay costs incident to the condemnation proceedings for additional ground in square No. 489, in the city of Washington, for site for a new police-court building, $4.80.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revert to line 15 of the page now being read. Because of the insertion of the last amendment, the words "fire department" are mere repetition, and I ask that they be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revert to line 15, page 18, to offer an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, line 15, strike out the words "fire department."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Judgments: For payment of the judgments, including costs, against the District of Columbia, set forth in House Documents Nos. 861, 875, and 897 of this session, $69,663.20, together with a further sum sufficient to pay the interest, at not exceeding 4 per cent, on said judgments, as provided by law, from the date the same became due until the date of payment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 22, strike out the word "and;" in line 23, after the word "seven," insert "1907;" and in line 24 strike out "$63.20" and insert "$47.30."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I would now ask that the committee return to page 13 and take up the paragraphs that, by consent, were passed over. I would call attention, in connection with the motion in regard to the pay of the deputy coroner, that its authorization is provided for in section 196 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, which reads as follows:

The Commissioners of said District shall have authority to appoint a deputy coroner, who shall assist the coroner in the performance of his duties aforesaid, and shall perform the same duties in case of absence or disability of the coroner, and shall, while acting, receive compensation at a rate not exceeding $5 per day, to be paid as other expenses of said District, and he shall give bond with a penalty of $2,500 under security to be approved by said Commissioners for the due performance of his duties.

The Commissioners, in pursuance of this section, have recommended to Congress the amount contained in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order must first be disposed of. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move to strike out the item, "Compensation for 1906, $255." The provision of the District Code read by the gentleman provides that the deputy coroner may be paid $5 per day for service in the case of absence of the coroner. This item being for $255, means that at $5 a day the deputy coroner rendered this year fifty-one days' service to the District of Columbia. According to the statement of the Commissioners when the appropriation bill was being made up, there were 79 autopsies and 49 inquests during the year. What this deputy coroner was doing for fifty-one days when the coroner himself found it impossible to keep busy it is impossible for me to tell. There is no necessity, in my judgment, for a deputy coroner.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman claim that there are any number of days in the year that the coroner had no case before him?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing in the hearings of the subcommittee that gives any information about this item. I repeat that the hearings on the appropriation bill show that there were 79 autopsies and 49 inquests.

Mr. LITTAUER. Well, the gentleman must be aware that the coroner is entitled to thirty days' leave and even thirty days' sick leave; and the deputy coroner has evidently been appointed to perform service during the absence of the coroner, and, as the gentleman states, worked fifty-one days, for which he is entitled to compensation under the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What information has the gentleman that this man worked fifty-one days?

Mr. LITTAUER. It figures out that way, and it is the sum recommended to the committee by the District Commissioners, who, under the law, are authorized to employ him at the stated sum, $5 a day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say to my colleague that that is a very unreliable source of information from which to make appropriations. I call his attention to the fact that the Commissioners asked him for an appropriation of $800 for a deficiency for rent for the office of the corporation counsel, although the corporation counsel was never authorized to hire an office.

Mr. LITTAUER. And he so informed us.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been the practice here for the corporation counsel to have his own office and for his assistants to have their office.

In the bill making appropriations for next year we provided that he should obtain a suite of offices, and that his assistants should go in there and attend to the public business in an office provided for that purpose, as soon as that is done the Commissioners come with a deficiency of $800 for rent from December, 1905, to the end of this fiscal year, and the Commissioners state that until the predecessor of present corporation counsel died he never knew that the corporation counsel and his assistants paid their own office rent.

These men have been Commissioners about three years. They are supposed to have some familiarity with the expenditures for the District, and yet they make the statement that until a man died and his successor moved into his office, they were not aware that they did not disburse the money for the rent of the office.

Throughout the hearings upon the appropriation bill it was found that the statements were not statements that could be relied upon for the purpose of making appropriations. I call the gentleman's attention to another thing which happened before the subcommittee. I do this because I hope that if these items to which I refer get into the bill in some other way the conferees of the House will not yield upon them. A building is now occupied temporarily for a police court. It was rented for a year and a half, at a rental of $3,000, upon the understanding that the owner was to expend $1,200 for repairs—that is, $1,800 is paid as rent and $1,200 was expended for repairs. An appropriation of $600 was made for this fiscal year for repairs. The Commissioners asked us for an appropriation of $800 for repairs for the coming fiscal year, although they expect to get out of the building on the 1st of January next. We allowed them $200, thinking perhaps there might be some necessity for the appropriation and convinced that the sum would be more than sufficient. Yet they go before a different subcommittee and ask to have made available for the coming six months the unexpended balance of $600 which they now have.

[The time of Mr. FITZGERALD having expired, by unanimous consent it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Here are two items that these Commissioners have the effrontery or the presumption to ask of the committee. One of the items has never been authorized by law and no liability has been incurred for the purpose stated; an appropriation has never been made for the purpose, but, because offices are provided for next year, it is assumed that we should pay for them for this year. If that reasoning is to hold good, we might as well go right back and reimburse the estate of the dead man—the former corporation counsel for the many years he occupied and paid for the offices.

Mr. LITTAUER. But that item was not allowed. We refused it consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not change the fact that they came up and did their utmost to get it. Then, on the other item, although they knew that the appropriation bill for the coming fiscal year had passed with $200 available for repairs upon the building, when $1,200 had been expended within two years, and when they had $600 for this year which was not used, they first asked for a deficiency of $600, and then they changed their request, as the hearings show, and asked that the unexpended balance of $600 be made available for the coming year.

When these gentlemen come and say that $255 has been earned by some deputy coroner, which means that he must have worked fifty-one days, although the coroner has all he can do to find enough to do to keep him from forgetting he has such an office, I believe that the committee and the House should require some satisfactory information about the necessities of the employment. I suggest to my colleague that no very great injustice will be done in this instance by striking this out. If it goes out, then if the appropriation can be justified the information will be forthcoming; and if the information to justify the appropriation is not given, the appropriation should not be made.

The coroner is doing pretty well if, at this stage, at the time the estimates for the deficiency were submitted, he had already managed to escape fifty-one days in this year from the work of his office, in view of the statement that there were but seventy-nine autopsies and forty-nine inquests in the previous year and $500 was expended in addition in having the autopsies made. We can not be too careful in scrutinizing the requests for these appropriations or in making the appropriations requested. So far as I am concerned, after six weeks' investigation upon the appropriation bill, I am not willing to take the mere recommendation of any men that money should be appropriated, and I say this so that there will be no misunderstanding, but that whenever appropriations are asked those asking will come prepared to substantiate the requests they make in a proper manner.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I trust that these items will not go out of the bill. While I have no desire to enter upon a defense of some of the actions of the Commissioners, they are, nevertheless, responsible men of high character. This is an item of appropriation authorized by law, recommended to us by the Commissioners to pay the salary at $5 a day for the services of a deputy coroner for fifty-one days.

I see no reason at all why we should require that the Commissioners bring vouchers with them to prove that fifty-one days were actually served, when they submit the necessary appropriation. It is perfectly proper and regular that we should include in the bill the amount due as submitted by the Commissioners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to my colleague that if he follows out that practice he will soon bankrupt the Government, if he accepts the statement of every person as to the amount of the appropriation that should be made.

The amendment was considered, and rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statue of Liberty, New York Harbor: To equip with the proper machinery and lighting apparatus to light the Statue of Liberty at Fort Wood, Bedloes Island, New York Harbor, carrying out the plans of the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War, including electric elevator and necessary repairs to place the statue, pedestal, foundations, and surroundings in safe condition, to continue available during the fiscal year 1907, $62,800.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the committee while I make a statement and then an inquiry. On yesterday I was hailed on the street by two of my constituents, a gentleman and his wife, who said that they were charged 25 cents for being transported to the premises where this Statue of Liberty is situated.

Mr. LITTAUER. Visitors are charged 25 cents for the trip from the Battery, in New York, to Bedloes Island and return on a steamer owned by a private individual, who is given the right to conduct the ferry by the Secretary of War, under whose jurisdiction the island is.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He also stated that there was another carrier who only charged 10 cents, and while he felt not very indignant over paying this small amount, yet——

Mr. LITTAUER. I think the gentleman's constituent is mistaken, and that there is no other ferry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He is an intelligent man, and particular in matters of that sort. He knows how to make money and how to take care of it, and he stopped me on the street and asked about it. I could not give him the information he desired. Now, I would like for the gentleman from New York to tell me exactly what right the citizen has to go there and who has a right to charge him, and if there is another carrier, as I understood my constituent to say, who charges 10 cents for carrying people over.

Mr. LITTAUER. My information is that the ferry has been established for many years between the Battery, in New York, and Bedloes Island, on which this statue is situated, and that the round-trip charge on the ferry is 25 cents.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How about the other fellow that carries for 10 cents?

Mr. LITTAUER. I do not believe that there is any such carrier.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There is no such carrier. There is only one boat.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not propose to raise any rumpus about it, but when one man is given by the Government the right to charge 25 cents and a private citizen only charges 10 cents, I thought there must be a wrong somewhere.

Mr. PAYNE. I would suggest that the gentleman's constituent might swim over. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, he might swim over—he might walk. He would if he set his head that way. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTAUER. I will inform the gentleman from Tennessee that many Members from New York and Brooklyn around me advise me that they know there is but one ferry authorized to carry visitors to this island, and that the charge for the round trip, as I stated, is 25 cents, and has been so for many years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, my friend and constitutent might have been mistaken. I am going to write him the intelligence that I have procured. The man is naturally a sober man and never took a drink in his life.

A MEMBER. What! And from Tennessee? [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. He was with his wife, and, as I say, he is not a drinking man. Now, gentlemen, I want horizontal justice done hereafter. We may not want justice in the great hereafter, but let us have it in the present. [Laughter.] If some one is carrying passengers to this statue for 10 cents, and the Government gives a special privilege to another to haul for 25 cents, I say that that is an imposition on somebody, and wrong, and ought not to be allowed.

Mr. LITTAUER. I am positive that it is not allowed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am rejoiced to know that there is no injustice being done about the precincts of the Statue of Liberty.

The Clerk read as follows:

California earthquake sufferers: Authority is hereby specifically given to the Secretary of War to use the appropriations for relief of sufferers from earthquake and conflagration on the Pacific coast, amounting in all to $2,500,000, not only to buy additional supplies as may be needed for the relief of the sufferers, as directed in the joint resolutions, approved April 19, April 20, and April 23, 1906, and for the purpose of replacing by purchase supplies which have been furnished by the Secretary of War for such relief from the stores on hand for the use of the Army and for the purpose of defraying all extra cost to the War Department incurred in mileage of officers, transportation of troops, and all other expenditures which would not have been necessary but for the relief measures herein described and authorized, but also for the expenditures for personal services of persons employed by the subsistence, quartermaster, medical, and signal bureaus in the measures undertaken by the Army for the furnishing and distribution of supplies and necessary sheltering of the sufferers and the needed sanitation of camps and other temporary settlements maintained by the War Department for such relief.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 9, page 23.

Insert after line 9, page 23, the following:

"To reimburse officers and enlisted men of the Army who were on duty under orders in San Francisco during the recent fire in this city for loss of clothing and other personal effects sustained by them through said fire, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That such reimbursement shall be made under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon vouchers to be approved by him in each case."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I feel compelled to make the point of order against this amendment.

Mr. HULL. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a moment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Of course I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. HULL. There is no doubt that it is subject to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. The naval bill recently passed here had an amendment placed on it by the Senate, which was agreed to by the House, in exactly this language applying to the Navy. The Army bill passed the House before the earthquake and terrible fire following, and it was impossible to make the same provision at that time for the Army. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States, having already made this provision for the Navy and the Marine Corps, should be willing to make it for the Army. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I regret to be compelled to insist upon the point of order. All others in the service of the United States would have just as good a claim for reimbursement of their losses if this were allowed.

Mr. HULL. The other two branches of the service have already received it. The Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps were ordered into the very heart of the district that was affected.

Mr. LITTAUER. And those who work in the mint and in the post-office lost property, as well as all the unfortunate citizens of San Francisco.

Mr. HULL. These men were compelled to go there and neglect their own matters. We have passed it for the Navy and the Marine Corps, and I now submit to the gentleman to refuse it to the Army, which was in the very heart of the business and who did more than the other did, will not be fair. They were taken from the barracks, where they were compelled to leave everything, and were compelled to go out and do police duty and every other kind of work in the very heart of this turmoil. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, it is a difficult position in which to be placed by the gentleman. I realize fully the very free and meritorious service of the Army in connection with this horrible disaster at San Francisco, but at the same time if we now supplement the provision already made for the men and officers of the Army, we ought to do just the same for all other Government employees who lost their effects in this conflagration.

Mr. HULL. They were ordered away from their barracks and they had to go.

Mr. LITTAUER. And I do not know why we should not also take care of the private citizens, if that is the fact.

Mr. HULL. It is not the same. The Army had no power to refuse to go and abandon everything they had.

Mr. LITTAUER. Where were these men located that they had to leave and go?

Mr. HULL. Some were in the Presidio, and some were in other places.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the Presidio was not damaged.

Mr. HULL. Other buildings were. The Phelan Building, headquarters of the Army, was destroyed.

Mr. LITTAUER. But the Phelan Building was an office building.

Mr. HULL. If they did not lose a dollar they do not get a dollar. This provides for the actual loss, and the difference between the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps and a civilian, is that in time of stress a civilian employee may look after his own property, but the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps have to go where they are ordered, even if they lose everything they have on earth.

Mr. LITTAUER. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to Texas: To reimburse to the State of Texas, in full settlement of all claims of any nature whatever on account of moneys actually expended by that State during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States, as ascertained under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, and certified in Senate Document No. 169 of this session, $375,418.94.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph just read. There is no existing law that authorizes this appropriation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand this provision is inserted in the bill in compliance with an act which was passed by Congress February 24, 1905, approved March 3, 1905, and which reads as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and report to Congress, for its consideration, what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in payment of the State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, in compliance with that instruction the Secretary of War has had this item audited. He has reported to the Committee on Appropriations the amount of his finding, and on that auditing authorized by this act of Congress this appropriation has been inserted in this appropriation bill. I take it that this is far more in compliance with law and existing law, far more an auditing of an account, than was the case the Chairman held to be such this afternoon, where a treaty had been made and the King of Sweden was authorized to ascertain the amount of the indebtedness due by the United States and Great Britain to certain people in the Samoan Islands, and where the King merely found that the amount was due and authorized some one else to audit the account. The Chair held that by virtue of that act and by virtue of that treaty that that was such an auditing of an account—because clearly it was not a judgment—as to make it existing law, and that it was in order on this bill.

Now, I take it, Mr. Chairman, that we all recognize that this committee has jurisdiction to place in this bill such judgments as are certified to it by the Secretary of the Treasury and such audited accounts as are presented to it. Some years ago, I believe in the Fifty-second Congress, the present Speaker of this House and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] secured the passage of a bill directing the Auditor of the United States to reaudit the accounts of the States of Indiana and Illinois as to expenditures made by those States during the civil war. The Auditor reaudited those accounts under that act of Congress. It was returned and placed in a general deficiency bill. When the matter was presented to the House the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] raised the point of order that it was not an audited account and was not in compliance with the existing law.

On that point of order the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], who then occupied the chair, held that it was within existing law because the auditing had been authorized by an act of Congress, that it was done in compliance with an act of Congress, and so reported to this House, and held that the point of order did not lie because the appropriation was under an act of Congress. Now, what is the difference between that condition of affairs and the present status of this claim? In that case an act of Congress was passed to authorize the Auditor to ascertain the amount that was due for money expended by the State of Indiana for the defense of the Union during the civil war, and the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to ascertain and report to Congress the amount of that claim, which was done, and it was held in order. In this case the Congress has passed a law directing the Secretary of War to ascertain what was due the State of Texas for the defense of the borders of the United States during the time between 1855 and 1860; I do not remember the exact year. The Secretary of War has ascertained that amount and reported it to Congress, has audited it, and it stands in identically the position that did the amount that was held in order by Mr. SHERMAN when he occupied the chair in reference to audited accounts of Illinois and Indiana. That being the case, I contend that this is clearly in order, clearly an audited account under an act of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to suggest to the committee that it would probably expedite the consideration of this question, which is quite an important one, to carry it over until to-morrow. The Chair has just had handed him this afternoon a letter from the Secretary of War, containing a complete history of this claim, and the Chair would like to take time this evening to go through it carefully and familiarize himself with the history, and then to-morrow take up the question of order and hear debate.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I have gone through this somewhat carefully, and it is a very simple matter, and one that the Chair would apprehend with a few words of explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. This is a claim, according to the appropriation bill, "as ascertained under an act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, and certified by Senate Document No. 169 of this session, $375,418.94." Now, the Senate document referred to in the appropriation bill is the document which the Chair has now in his possession, to wit, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the result of investigations made by the Secretary of War, etc. Now, in the first place, if the Chair will observe the language of the act approved March 3, 1905, he will find that it does not authorize a final auditing:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and to report to Congress for its consideration what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States.

Now, I say, in the first place, that is not an authorization of law to finally audit this claim, and I say, in the second place, that, according to this letter, the Secretary of War has not finally audited the claim. If the Chair will allow, on page 31 of the document which he has, he will find:

It should be noted that the act of March 3, 1905, applies in terms to money actually expended by Texas in payment of State volunteers or rangers. In a strictly military sense this can only be construed as allowing for the pay of the troops to the exclusion of disbursements on account of subsistence, forage, equipment, ordnance stores, and other expenses. It is possible, however, that the expression "in payment of" may have been intended by Congress to mean in payment of any expense of the troops in question, including both pay and allowances and other proper military expenses. In any event, it will be seen from an examination of the account submitted that it is impossible to segregate the amount expended by the State for pay proper from that expended for other purposes. In the summary given before, therefore, no attempt has been made to state separately the amount expended on account of the pay of the troops, and that summary includes all of the expenditures for the purposes indicated in the respective State acts making appropriations.

Here, therefore, is one item where the Secretary of War has not ascertained whether or not the amount appropriated would be a final payment of the State's claim. I read further:

It is also to be remarked that the act of March 3, 1905, requires that the money shall have been actually expended during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860. An examination of the accounts submitted shows that while all these State appropriations were made during the period indicated, some of the money was actually expended after June 21, 1860. A distinction is therefore made in the summary of expenditures between payments made before and those made after June 21, 1860.

So there is another item which goes to show that this is not a final audit.

Mr. BURLESON. That is not embodied in the item.

Mr. DALZELL. Suppose it is not embodied. Then it does not make a final disposition of this claim and leaves it open for adjudication at some future Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is not a fact that the Secretary of War has audited the claim to the extent that Congress authorized him to audit, and therefore it is in conformity with the law?

Mr. DALZELL. Congress did not authorize him to audit at all. It authorized him to examine the accounts and report to Congress. That is all that it authorized him to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not an authorization of auditing. It is merely an ascertainment——

Mr. DALZELL. He tells you as to these items that I have called the Chair's attention to, that he is not now making a final audit. There is in there a third item, which I will not stop to read, because it is in the same category as those I have already read. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is on all fours with a case decided by the gentleman from Indiana, the present occupant of the chair, a somewhat well-known case—the case of Greer County.

On April 16, 1904, the general deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when Mr. JOHN H. STEPHENS, of Texas, proposed this amendment:

"Insert, after line 18, page 9, the following:

"'To refund to the State of Texas the sum of $50,875.53, the sum being the amount due the State of Texas in the adjustment of claims relating to the transfer of Greer County, Okla., from the State of Texas to the United States.'"

Mr. HEMENWAY, of Indiana, made the point of order that the proposed amendment was out of order, being a claim. Mr. STEPHENS argued that the act of 1901 authorized the Secretary of the Interior to audit this account. The law actually provided that the Secretary of the Interior should examine the claims of Greer County against Texas and of Texas against Oklahoma and report to Congress. The law provided that the Secretary, having made the examination, should report in detail to Congress, but the law made no provision directing the payment of any balance due. The Chairman said:

"The Chair is of the opinion, upon the statement of the gentleman from Texas, that the amendment is not in order. The appropriation is not authorized by existing law, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order."

Now, the authorization to the Secretary of the Interior to audit this claim of Greer County, or the relative claims of Greer County and Oklahoma, was in the very terms of the act of 1905, which is appealed to here to-day to sustain this appropriation. I submit to the Chair that is it absolutely impossible to differentiate the two cases, and therefore the point of order should be sustained.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word on this subject. The deficiency appropriation bill is the bill that usually carries the appropriations for the payment of claims. The rule of the committee has always been to report appropriations for the payment of claims that have been audited by the Treasury Department, or by any other Department, when audited in accordance with law, and also judgments of the Court of Claims that are certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress for appropriations.

At the beginning of this Congress the Committee on Appropriations reported an appropriation in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill to pay the claims of the State of Pennsylvania and the State of New York for interest to these two States for the amount advanced by them during the war of 1812. Now, the authorization for that audit—and I speak of this more especially for the purpose of explaining why this item appears in this bill—the authorization for the auditing, or the examination of that account, and report to Congress the amount found due, is in 33 Statutes, 777, as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to resettle and readjust all claims of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware for and on account of advances and expenditures made by said States in the war of 1812 to 1815 with Great Britain, and that in computing interest on said advances the Secretary of the Treasury shall apply the same rule as that which was applied in the settlement of a like claim with the State of Maryland under the provisions of the act approved on the 3d day of March, 1857.

Now, that was the authority we gave the Secretary of the Treasury to examine into and ascertain the amount due these three States for interest paid on the amounts advanced by them during the war of 1812. At the beginning of this session the amount was certified to Congress and referred to the Committee on Appropriations by the War Department for the repayment to the State of Texas of the amount which that State expended in protecting its frontier from Mexican marauders and Indians.

Now, this was referred by Congress to the War Department, and the whole question has been thoroughly investigated under the Military Secretary, General Ainsworth, a gentleman in whom we all have the utmost confidence. He has submitted a statement to Congress of the amount found due the State. The authority for that investigation is found in the act approved March 3, 1905, the same year that Congress passed the act under which the claims of the States of Pennsylvania, New York, and Rhode Island were adjusted, the only difference being that this was referred to the War Department, while the other claims were referred to the Treasury Department. The language is substantially the same:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and report to Congress for its consideration what sum or sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period of time between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the governor of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States.

Reimbursement for these expenditures has heretofore been authorized by law. This question was referred by Congress to the War Department for the purpose of ascertaining the amount actually expended and not reimbursed under the act of 1855 and the act of 1860. Mr. Chairman, the result of this Congressionally authorized investigation or audit was presented to the committee, and it seemed to the committee that it was justified in carrying this provision in the bill appropriating for this amount, for the reason that the authorization is almost identical in form and substance with the authorization under which similar claims have heretofore been submitted to the Department respecting claims for other States. For that reason I think the matter is in order. Adjustment was authorized by Congress. An examination was authorized by Congress to ascertain the amount that has not been paid to Texas which Congress has heretofore authorized to be paid to Texas under the two acts of Congress I have heretofore referred to.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to call the Chair's attention to the fact that after reciting the three items I have already called the attention of the Chair to the Secretary of War goes on to say "subject to the foregoing remarks, the following table is submitted." That is to say, leaving out these three unadjusted claims, he submits the "following table;" and the Chair will find that he states at the end that if one view of the case is taken there is so much money due, and if another view of the case is taken a certain other amount of money is due.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that the Secretary of War has certified to Congress the amount he has found due the State of Texas under the act passed in 1905. Now, then, what does it come here for? Evidently it does not come here to be examined. It does not come to Congress for us to consider the question whether it is due or not due, and to reopen the investigation for that purpose. He certified it to us for the purpose of paying it, and it was sent here for no other purpose, and the act is susceptible of no other construction. And I think, Mr. Chairman, that it is not so much a question as to what language was used as it is what purpose Congress had in view in sending it to be audited. It was sent to be audited for the sole purpose of finding the specific and definite sum due the State of Texas by the Government, and they have certified it to Congress, and it has come back here for payment and not for points of order. Now, then, let us look at the Fifty-seventh Congress to the language used there in that act, and I want to call the attention of the Chair to the ruling that was made then. There was a point of order made there to an almost similar provision of law, and this was the ruling then:

The Chair will say that on page 1048 of the Statutes at Large, volume 32, is found the following provision:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine the claim of Messrs. Gallatly, Hankey & Co., of London, England, owners of the British steamship Mogul, for damages alleged to be due said owners by reason of the collision between said steamship Mogul and the U. S. transport Warren in Manila Bay on December 30, 1900, and determine what damages, if any, are due thereby to said owners of said steamship Mogul, and to certify the amount of such damages, if any are found to be due, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to report the same to Congress for its action."

Now, to the bill carrying an appropriation to pay the amount found due under that act a point of order was made, and the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], who occupied the chair in Committee of the Whole at that time, made this ruling upon that matter, and, I think, ruled correctly:

Thus it has been held to be a special auditing authorized by law, and the appropriation of money for the purpose of paying the amount found to be due is in order under the rules of the House. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the same ruling was made in the Fifty-eighth Congress, under the appropriation to pay the claims of the States of Maine, Iowa, and some other States, almost of a like character as this. The Chairman there held:

The statute, which has been read in full, plainly refers these several claims to the Auditor for reexamination and reauditing, with a view to allowance or disallowance. That has been done, as the gentleman from Illinois states, and the certificate of the Auditor is produced here.

Just as we have here. And it has been repeatedly held that any audited account—not necessarily the judgment of a court, but any account audited by direction of Congress—is in order on a deficiency appropriation bill. That is this case, and the Chair should overrule the point of order if precedents are to be followed.

Any official auditing a claim, authorized by an act of this body—I do not care to whom we send it, if the party is an official of this Government—if we send it to him and direct him to audit it, and he does so and reports it back to Congress, it comes back here for our action, and we must either pay it or reject it, and its proper and only place, in my judgment, is on a deficiency appropriation bill. And if we are to treat the State of Texas as we have treated all other States having similar claims possessing no more merit than this does, then we will make this appropriation and pay this claim that ought to have been paid years and years ago. I hope the point of order will be overruled.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the question whether this paragraph in the bill is properly before this House is the only question that you and I have to deal with, and the only way in which you can decide that matter is to trace the manner in which it came into this House. The act of Congress making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, and for prior years, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1905, contains the following provision:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to inquire and report to Congress—

for its consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the way it came into the Appropriations Committee room, and I presume the Chair will hold that that committee is a part of Congress. Then we had a right to consider it. Why? Because at a previous session of Congress the investigation had been ordered, and the War Department was ordered to report to Congress for its consideration, and first through your committee this consideration was had.

Now, what was to be considered? This act states emphatically what was to be considered. It was the sum of money due Texas, for a specific purpose, expended by her. General Ainsworth, representing the War Department, has reported specifically what amount was found due Texas. Now, first, the point of order can not be good, because this Congress itself ordered the investigation to be made. In the second place, it ordered the findings to be sent to Congress. In the third place, it ordered these findings to be sent here for consideration. In the fourth place, the consideration is being had, and has been had, first, by your committee, and now by the Committee of the Whole, and no point of order can hold against it.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the point of order. I do not believe the point of order will lie, but preliminary to its discussion I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is willing to withdraw the point of order and let the issue as to whether Texas is to be paid in accordance with the provisions of this item be fought out on its merits? If he will do that, if I do not get full two-thirds majority of this House in favor of leaving it in the bill, I will myself ask to withdraw the item from the consideration of the House.

I want to say to the gentleman that a point of order was made against this item carrying a part of this claim nearly fifty years ago, and Texas has not yet been paid, though an appropriation for same was made in 1860, which, because of the coming on of the civil war, was subsequently covered back in the Treasury.

I want to futhermore state to the gentleman that I hold in my hand a report embodying a claim in favor of his State, the State of Pennsylvania, for $236,762 for interest, not principal, but interest, on a claim growing out of the war of 1812, and when, during the early days of this session, that item, carried in the urgent deficiency bill, was questioned on the floor I stood, and the RECORD will support my statement, and defended that item for Pennsylvania. Now, I ask again, I would like to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is willing to have this item fought out on its merits?

Evidently not, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman refuses to respond. I take it that he is not willing to submit the merits of this question to this body, consisting of an overwhelming Republican majority, and let it determine whether this is a just and righteous claim.

Mr. DALZELL. I am standing on my right, defending the rules of the House. As far as merits of the claim are concerned, I am ready to meet those when they arrive.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I make no pretense to being a parliamentarian. I believe I would rather serve a term in prison than read a dozen precedents of parliamentary law; but I do want a word upon the philosophy of the rule that is now being invoked against this item. What is the rule, or rather what is the basis of authority, for permitting items of this kind to be embodied in an appropriation bill? There is a general law, Mr. Chairman, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit certain claims, or claims of a certain character, and when they are so audited the same law directs that they shall be transmitted to the Congress for its consideration. This law affords the only basis for embodying provisions for the payment of many claims which are carried in appropriation bills.

Now I will read to the Chair the law under which items of this character are generally embodied in appropriation bills.

It is an act of Congress passed in 1884, and it provides as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall, at the commencement of each session of Congress, report the amount due each claimant whose claim has been allowed in whole or in part to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who shall lay the same before their respective Houses for consideration.

Mr. Chairman, the Congress passed that law; it authorized a certain officer of our Government to audit claims, and directed the manner of the auditing the general classes of claims. That law is the basis and authority upon which the great majority of items providing for the payment of claims go into the deficiency appropriation bill. Who will contend, Mr. Chairman, that the same power, the same lawmaking body—the Congress—can not pass another law directing another official of the Government to audit an account or to ascertain the exact amount due on a claim? Who will contend that more validity should be given to the one act of Congress than is given to the other act of Congress? Who will contend that one law is of more binding force and effect than another law passed by the same body?

It is true that the general law covering the auditing of claims requires that the work shall be done by the Treasury Department, but, Mr. Chairman, who will say that Congress can not pass a special law requiring another officer, the Secretary of War, if it wills, to audit a particular claim? And when such claim is audited by the Secretary of War and transmitted to Congress for its consideration, as the special law directs, where is the logic of the contention that it has not the same legislative status that is given claims audited under the general law?

Mr. Chairman, Congress could, if it saw fit, repeal the general law I read a moment ago and pass another law directing any official it might see fit to name in the law as the official who shall audit claims and transmit them to Congress for its consideration.

Why, this morning, Mr. Chairman, we had under discussion another item, against which the same point of order was raised, where the supreme law in the shape of a treaty authorized the appropriation, and where under the same law it was provided that a person, not an official of the Treasury Department, not even a citizen of our country, but the king of a foreign country, should audit that claim, and yet the Chair properly overruled the point of order raised on the ground that it was not authorized by law and that it had not been properly audited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here is an act of Congress, act of 1905, passed because of certain former acts of Congress which dealt with this same subject-matter. The act of 1855 and the act of 1860 were referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. Now, what does the act of 1905 direct? It directed that the officer of the Government—who? the Secretary of War—shall do what? Ascertain the amount due Texas by the General Government for certain sums paid out by Texas between certain dates, which sums should have been paid by the General Government. Does that not direct the auditing of the account? Isn't that an authorization of law for the ascertainment of the account and also an authorization that when that act has been performed by the Secretary of War the result of his action shall be submitted to Congress for consideration?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says the precedent in the Greer County case is on all fours with this case; that said precedent was made by the present occupant of the chair, who ruled on the point of order which established that precedent; that it is absolutely impossible to differentiate the two cases. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I see it, nothing is easier. In the Greer County case the law authorized, after the state of the account had been ascertained, that the Secretary of the Interior should report to Congress. Nothing more. When this report was made it was a full compliance with every provision of that law. And in that case I think the point of order was properly sustained. Now, wherein does the present case differ from that case? It directs the ascertainment of the account; so far, I admit the cases are on all fours. It directs that when the account is ascertained a report shall be made to Congress; so far, I admit the cases are on all fours. But, Mr. Chairman, in the Greer County case the law stopped just at this point, and in this case now before you it goes one step further and added thereto the words "for its consideration." Now, sir, unless it is claimed that these words can be disregarded, given no effect, completely nullified, I contend that the point must be overruled, for to do otherwise would be to refuse to do what the Congress, in the law of 1905, said should be done. How can we carry out the mandate of Congress, that this matter shall after certain acts had been performed by the Secretary of War, be reported to Congress "for its consideration," unless the item is embodied in this bill, and not being subject to the point of order, be brought before the Congress for its consideration? Can it be said that we have carried out this law if this point of order is sustained and consideration of same is, in consequence of this fact, refused?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I direct attention to the fact that this act of 1905 is clothed in the exact phraseology in which a law of this character is usually clothed. Mr. Chairman, another matter, by way of persuasion, to which I direct attention. A few days ago a bill was reported to the Senate, passed that body, and was brought before this body and passed. It provided for the ascertainment of certain claims in favor of the city of Boston or a sewerage company that might arise by reason of the damage caused by the discharge of guns belonging to the Government on Deer Island. The Secretary of War was present when this bill was considered by the Appropriations Committee, and this very question that has been raised here was then raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN], as to whether or not language similar to the language used in the act of 1905, which I invoke, would take a claim of this character without the general class of claims that otherwise would be submitted to the Committee on Claims.

This matter was carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and the Secretary of War, a man whom it is said is to grace the Supreme Bench at an early date, was present at the time. The matter was discussed and that bill was reported to this House and passed, containing substantially the phraseology in the act of 1905 upon which I reply, and I now call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] to the fact that if this ruling now invoked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to be established here against this Texas claim the law relative to the claims of the citizens of Massachusetts, which law he was assured was so framed as not to subject them to the necessity of going before the Committee on Claims, will be absolutely worthless to them. Now, I desire to read the pertinent part of the law to which I have alluded, and then I shall conclude what I have to say. I read a section of that law:

SEC. 2. That the United States shall be liable for any damage to the property of the city of Boston or to the works of the North Metropolitan Sewerage System located on said island that may be caused by the firing of guns in time of peace from batteries erected within the area that may be acquired as aforesaid; and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed, whenever any such damage occurs, to ascertain and determine what would be a reasonable and proper compensation to pay the city of Boston and shall certify the same to Congress for consideration.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of the precedents cited by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRUNDIDGE], in the light of the argument made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], I confidently contend that the Chair can not and will not sustain the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the general deficiency appropriation bill and had come to no resolution thereon.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19750, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for one hour.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, once more we are called upon to make grateful acknowledgment to my engaging colleague [Mr. RAINEY] for again conducting our imaginations into the realm of the unreal and the insubstantial. In the language of that domain of the fancy, the curtain was rung down last night upon the fourth act of the thrilling drama that has absorbed our attention at intervals during the past three months. Those four acs were given upon different days to comport with the magnitude of the theme and out of consideration for the nervous strain made upon the principal actors. The fifth act now follows. The customary interval has been made as brief as possible, not only to relieve my amiable colleague [Mr. RAINEY] from the distressing mass of misinformation which oppresses him, but also to allay any fear that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] might otherwise entertain that in the preparation of these closing scenes there had been any unwarranted concession to the oil trust, any unfair, clandestine, midnight consumption of the octupus-priced illuminant.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think you will all agree with me that this drama ought to be classified as a comedy, notwithstanding some scenes that we witnessed last night, and that as such it ought to have an appropriate title. Inasmuch as my colleague who was the author, or perhaps we ought to say the instigator of this performance, left his offspring nameless, a decent regard for the opinion of mankind makes it fitting and proper that we should bestow a name upon the orphan, and I suggest as a title, "Government by advertisements; or, who gets sold most in the watch trade?" [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, in order to appreciate fully the scenes that we witnessed last night and to understand those that are now to follow, and, what is of more importance in order to surround ourselves with the proper atmosphere of genuine comedy, we must recall the plot and action of the first three acts.

The first act was given on the 5th and 6th of April last. In that act my versatile colleague [Mr. RAINEY] and Keene of Broadway occupied the center of the stage. And in that act the theme of this great drama was divulged to us. With keen artistic perception my colleague withheld the disclosure of the theme until the suspense was almost painful. First he gave a dark-brown soliloquy on taxation in general, and then a bright red fulmination against the iniquities of the steel industry; and, then, at the opening of the second scene, as it were, just as curiosity was on tiptoe, with a tremendous fanfare of verbal trumpets the theme was literally hurled at us, "We must revise the tariff and reconstruct our national revenue system, involving the annual collection and expenditure of something like $800,000,000, to comply with the exuberant ebullition of a sensational Broadway advertiser." Truly a comical idea. Did Sheridan or Rostand or George Ade ever conceive of anything half so droll?

Then, by a clever piece of stage mechanism, he brought before us Keene, of Broadway, whom he first described as "a typical Democrat," leaving the inference that he regretted he was not able to appear as a Member upon the floor of the House. Then, with a large picture, he produced what the pictorial artists called "local color." There we had before us Keene's shop. There was the advertisement of the protection sale of watches; there was the more suggestive advertisement repeated on each window, "Diamonds at cut prices;" there were Keene's clerks and salesmen lined up on the sidewalk gazing into the windows to represent the crowd of curious gaping purchasers, eager to buy his nondescript watches and paste diamonds, and there, too, was the omnipresent New York newsboy in the foreground, who looked wiser than all of those who were ever taken in by Keene, of Broadway, with a shrewd wink on his face, as though he were saying, "Get wise to dis guy's cheap bait for easy suckers." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Yes, there was Keene's shop; there was Keene himself in the gallery, and there were Keene's words in his advertisements, showing us that the tariff ought to be revised. Everything about Keene was here except his voice, and my colleague furnished the voice and read the advertisements. Voice is not the thing in which anyone would suppose that my colleague is lacking. It was all very clever, very ingenious.

Then how delightfully funny was the solemn silence, the ponderous impenetrability with which my colleague received the effusive tender of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] of a 15 per cent ad valorem duty on watches. Those of you who had the pleasure of witnessing that scene will recall it at a mere suggestion. My colleague had read the advertisements of Keene, of Broadway. The tariff, then, ought to be revised. Just then he became embarrassed, apparently, and seemed to be uncertain as to how it ought to be revised. The audience began to shift uneasily in their seats. Suddenly the spot light shifted, and into the bright pink zone leaped the gentleman from Mississippi, waving in his hand a bill to fix the duties on watches at 15 per cent ad valorem. Then the audience looked to see my colleague welcome him with open arms, to recognize the political strawberry mark on his right arm, and greet him as a long-lost, free-trade brother. No; not one word of thanks, not one gesture of gratitude, not even a nod of appreciation. My colleague simply glared at the gentleman from Mississippi in dumb disdain. "Standing like Teneriffe, he smote him with his eyes." How De Wolfe Hopper would have envied that pose.

Some discriminating critic might say there was lack of humor in this first act, that it was somewhat heavy, but we must recollect that my colleague took various parts, and one of the principal parts was that of the gravedigger. He buried pretty nearly everything and everybody that he referred to. He buried the watch industry, and he buried the steel industry, and he buried the Republican party, and the curtain fell upon the first act as my colleague, with spade in hand and sweat pouring from his brow, disinterred the personification of the Democratic party, who, with dust in his eyes, had been standing buried for two thousand years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Anyone who says that the part of a gravedigger can not be made humorous never had the exquisite delight of seeing McVicker as the first clown in the opening scene in the fifth act of Hamlet.

It became my duty unexpectedly to assume the chief rôle in the second act, and, therefore, of this I can say but little. Of course I availed myself of the mechanism introduced by my colleague and produced here the reply of those connected with the watch industry who saw fit to send their facts to our committee, denying almost in toto the charges that were made by my colleague. My cue, of course, was the attack upon the officers and employees of the Elgin Watch Company, of Illinois, of which all Illinois people, except my colleague, are justly proud. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said some very kind things about the opening part of that act. To this I can only say, in the words of the greatest of all dramatists:

> A jest's prosperity lies in the ear
> Of him that hears it, never in the tongue
> Of him that makes it.

So I will say no more about this second act, except that I was greatly pleased that my little extemporaneous jeu d'esprit found prosperity in the ear of such a discriminating critic as the gentleman from Mississippi.

But the third act was the gem of the play. As soon as the curtain rose the gentleman from Mississippi sprang into the limelight waving a volume of fairy tales in either hand—in one a parody on Robinson Crusoe and in the other the free-trade fables of Bastiat. From beginning to end he entered thoroughly into the spirit of the comedy. He was spirited, magnetic, captivating. How delicate was the irony with which he referred to "Keene of Broadway." He said in effect: "It makes no difference who Keene is. What we want to know is what Keene did." And then he went on to emphasize the fact that what Keene did was to attempt to bring into this country some American watch works which had been sent abroad, improved and added to with foreign labor, and brought back in contravention of article 483 of the Dingley tariff. If he had wished to follow the example of the old Elizabethan dramatist and wind up this scene with a rhyming couplet, he might have told what Keene attempted to do by using a word that rhymed with juggled.

One of the most humorous scenes of the whole play was the one that contained the colloquy in reference to the long-staple cotton. The gentleman from Mississippi had told the committee how sincerely devoted he was to a tariff for revenue only. Thereupon I asked him his opinion of a bill that was pending before the Ways and Means Committee imposing a tariff of 10 cents a pound on Egyptian long-staple cotton in the lint and 4 cents a pound in the seed. The question seemed to give the gentleman from Mississippi a spasm, and it took him over a page in the RECORD to answer the question, and he insisted that it was irrelevant, and then that it could not have been introduced by a Democrat, and then when he found that this could not be maintained, he assumed an injured air, saying, in effect, "What did the gentleman from Illinois mean by trying to tempt him by asking his opinion of a bill that would put $15,000 or $20,000 into his own pocket?" Then he summoned all the sewing women and dentists of the country in grand convention. There they were thrown before the eyes of our imagination. We looked at the sewing women, and I thought how contented and happy and prosperous they looked, and they seemed to be singing that lovely tune—

> We get more pay than we ever did,
> And our hours of work are less.

As for the dentists, why, they looked as happy and prosperous as a convention of Mississippi cotton manuafcturers. And when he had them assembled, he addressed them to this effect: "Oh, sewing women and dentists of this great Republic, it will now be vouchsafed to you to witness the most sublime spectacle of the immolation of interest, of self-interest, of my self-interest, upon the altar of principle for your sakes." Then his frame straightened perceptibly, his chest expanded, and a new thrill came into his voice as he said: "Do you think I would rob the poor sewing women and all the dentists and bricklayers and carpenters of this country to put money into my pocket and the pockets of my constituents? If you do, you are mistaken." And in the brackets there was "Applause on the Democratic side."

Now, the real humor of this can only be discerned by following what happened a few days later when the subject of the cotton-tax bill was before the House and it was developed in debate that there was no long-staple cotton grown anywhere in the State of Mississippi, and that a duty on long-staple cotton would not improve the price of the short cotton, but that it would decrease the demand for such cotton, and therefore would decrease pro tanto its price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman to say that it was somehow disclosed that there was no long-staple cotton raised in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. BOUTELL. Not a particle.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, it affords me infinite pain to say that the gentleman from Illinois does not know what he is talking about. The entire Mississippi-Yazoo delta raises "long-staple" cotton. I have raised it myself, and there is not a planter in the swamp part of the county of Yazoo that does not raise it. It is raised in Washington, Coahoma, Warren, and Bolivar counties, and in all the northwestern part of Mississippi and in some other parts of the State. Now, perhaps the gentleman has "Sea Island" cotton, of still longer fiber, mixed up with the long-staple cotton. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Let me read page 6549 of the RECORD:

Mr. BOUTELL. I would like to ask two or three questions in reference to this cotton.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, I have only about three minutes remaining.

Mr. BOUTELL. First, the gentleman from Florida is absolutely sure that none of this long-staple cotton is grown in the State of Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The Government reports show it is only grown in the three States I have named.

Mr. BOUTELL. According to the Government reports, there is no long-staple cotton grown anywhere in the State of Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No sea-island cotton; I think there is none grown except in those three States.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will ask further whether a tax of 5 cents a pound or even 10 cents a pound would in any way affect the price of short cotton?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not think it will. I do not think that the millions of bales of short cotton would be affected in the slightest degree.

Mr. BOUTELL. I could not see how they would be, even to the fraction of a mill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think anything like a large duty upon Egyptian cotton would affect the price of short cotton, and would affect it by reducing pro tanto the price of short cotton.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield any further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman does not want to decline to yield after a statement like that.

Mr. BOUTELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further time; the time is so short. If I could have an extension of time I would be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to ask any questions. I merely do not like a statement like that to go without correction.

Mr. BOUTELL. I decline to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is the fact that long-staple cotton is grown in Mississippi. It is raised on my own land. Sea-island cotton is not grown there. Mr. CLARK'S bill referred to "long-staple" cotton.

Mr. BOUTELL. I decline to yield any further in this synopsis.

And so, Mr. Chairman, it makes one shudder to think what all the sewing women and dentists of the country would say when they discovered that this sublime spectacle which they were called on to witness was simply a piece of play-acting fanfarronade. [Applause.] The delicate, veiled humor in this scene was in showing how often in our reported speeches the applause within the brackets is not justified by either the wisdom or correctness of the text. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, for real, solid humor perhaps we got the best laugh out of the closing scene of this act. The gentleman from Mississippi, availing himself of the mechanism introduced by my colleague, had two or more of his associates act as human phonographs. They read sentiments which were not their own. One of the most interesting phonographic rôles was that taken by the illustrious gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNE]. Some days later he made a speech explaining why he was now on the Democratic side of the House and representing a district of New York, and took occasion to say that from childhood's happy hours he had been a "nationalist." All who saw that earnest speech were convinced that he impressed his hearers as being one of the best formed men in Congress. [Laughter.] He told us that he was a nationalist. Well, we all knew he was on a "list"—on some list—and that a few years ago he was next to the top of a very prominent list. But our recollection was that the first syllable of that list was "pop." [Laughter.] If he had been called upon to repeat one of Mr. Bryan's silver speeches or some seething paragraphs from "Coin" Harvey there would have been no humor about it; but no one but the gentleman from Mississippi would ever have thought of the delicate humor of calling upon him to read the well-known fiction of the Manchester school. The curtain fell upon the third act with that delightful picture before us of the gentleman from Mississippi ostentatiously, but nervously, tying a long Manchester bib under the chin of the eloquent gentleman from New York, while that imposing populist—I mean impressive nationalist [laughter]—ladled out free-trade gruel to his squirming colleagues, who made wry faces at each ladleful, when they thought of the letters they had in their pockets from their constituents saying, "Whatever other political folly you feel compelled to commit, for heaven's sake don't tinker with the tariff." [Laughter and applause.]

Last evening we had the pleasure of listening to the fourth act. It was rather disappointing; in the first place, because the element of surprise was largely lacking. I have here a paper dated June 2 containing a half column account of an important speech made by my colleague in the House of Representatives the day before, on the 1st of June, and I had read it with great interest, as I suppose, doubtless, many others did. So the fourth act was a little lacking in this element of surprise. Then, again, my colleague seemed to have lost a little of his sense of artistic proportion. Something or some one seemed to have guided him out of the ruddy, warm atmosphere that should surround genuine comedy. So it becomes my task to get the play back, if I can, into that atmosphere. In the first place, then, I must revert to the theme of my colleague: "We must revise the tariff" to conform to the advertisements of "Keene, of Broadway."

Now, I want to ask, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, whether any member of this committee can conceive of any reason why this advertisement of Keene, of Broadway, of all the advertisements in the world, should have so impressed the mind of my colleague. The world is full of advertisements. We see them everywhere; they assail our eyes in foreign lands, as we go up the Rhine, or visit the Pyramids of Cheops, or ascend the Rocky Mountains in our own land.

They are in the street cars, they are on the dead walls. They are all alluring, seductive. Some of them are persuasive, almost compelling, and if we were to govern our actions by advertisements, we might as well adjourn Congress and repeal the moral law and the ten commandments. You will see, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as we proceed, how important it is to discover why this advertisement by Keene so impressed my colleague's mind, and in order to discover what its secret influence was, we must consider some of the advertisements that he has passed by altogether. You remember them. As I rode up on the car this evening I saw a number of them, which might be guides to one's life and habits. Take this one.

Sunny Jack, the statesman's breakfast food! Marvelous in its effects! One meal of Sunny Jack will make a Democratic Congressman feel so buoyant and gay that he will be able to contemplate the all-pervading prosperity of his country, not only without a pang, but even with equanimity. Eat Sunny Jack and look happy.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

It is quite apparent from a mere glance at my colleague that he at least has never been led astray by this advertisement, and sought to cheer his heart by a diet of Sunny Jack. Or take this:

Roastem, a mild, brown drink for nervous people. Wonderful, mysterious Roastem! Cools the blood, soothes the nerves, warms the feet! All those whose nights are made miserable by frightful visions of greedy, avaricious trusts glaring at them out of the darkness at the foot of the bed can obtain instant relief by substituting Roastem for all other beverages.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

It would be quite superfluous to ask of my colleague whether he had endeavored to quiet his rebellious and tempestuous nerves by giving up all other drinks and resorting only to Roastem. Or take this:

Jag-I-See, the food for genius. All great brain workers use Jag-I-See. Why look morose and melancholic—after great mental strain when a diet of Jag-I-See will give you all the innocency of vision, all the intellectual freshness, and all the aimless agility of a young spring calf? Back to pasture!

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Would anybody suppose from glancing at my colleague's haggard eyes that he had in any way sought to find rest and relief from the ravaging labors of pursuing the watch trust officials by a diet of Jag-I-See? Or take another:

Guffy's Poor Hay Brandy, an old medicinal tonic of unrivaled spuriousness. If anyone needs to be convinced that he can only attain a loquacious longevity by using Guffy's Poor Hay Brandy, let him read a few of our countless testimonials. The venerable Senator Talkmore writes that at the age of 117 years he is still able to make a four-hour tariff speech without ever stopping, and without even thinking.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

He attributes this marvelous faculty, this wonderful ability to exercise his voice without exerting his mind to the daily consumption for over 100 years of a gallon of Guffy's Poor Hay Brandy.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Would anyone have the temerity to intimate that my colleague had endeavered to find inspiration from this source rather than from Keene, of Broadway? Or take another:

Nutty-Nut, the Great Medicated, Homeopathic, Predigested, Peptonated, Concentration of Natural Nutriment!

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Nutty-Nut is nature's substitute for all other forms of food and drink. Note its homeopathic qualities. Nutty-Nut—like cures like. The intelligent use of Nutty-Nut is warranted to completely restore the mental equilibrium of anyone who has become a bit nutty on economic questions. Our secret agents have scoured the globe, and have bought up vast quantities of exported Nutty-Nut at a mere fraction of the domestic price, and we are reimporting it to undersell the home market. Our watchword is "No Nutty-Nut for foreigners; we need it all at home."

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Reimported cut-rate Nutty-Nut in large lots to free-trade leagues.

Have the gentleman from Mississippi or my colleague or those of their associates, whose intellectual integrity causes them writhing agony as they try to harmonize their honest free-trade convictions with insincere campaign professions of devotion to incidental and accidental protection, endeavored to heal their lacerated consciences with the diet of Nutty-Nut?

Or take this:

Petunia, a Sovereign Remedy for Everything. We have produced more unauthorized bad pictures of good men gone long on Petunia than have any other publishers of fatuous fables for driveling dupes. Petunia fears no test. Seventy-three bottles of Petunia taken in thirty-seven hours have been known to cure a Populist of a virulent attack of the quantitative theory of finance. Petunia cures all diseases, prevents death, and restores life. We now make the astounding announcement for the first time that recent scientific investigation has disclosed and confirmed what we have always believed, that over 60 per cent of the present population of modern Egypt is composed of mummies—mummies of the reign of Ptotmes the Second, restored to life—to active, gainful life, many of them as officeholders, by the judicious use of petunia.

[Laughter.]

Petunia will revitalize the corpse of a paramount issue, and restore to it all of its pristine virtues except the odor.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Cut rate Petunia to political organizations organized for the purpose of resuscitating Free Traders, Sixteen-to-Oners, Anti-Imperialists, and other dead ones.

Has my colleague made any arrangement with Keene, of Broadway, to reimport Petunia for use in the coming campaign? But why go on? One more comes to my mind that I saw to-day.

"Ganderine for the Head, the Most Amazing and Stupendous Discovery of this Age of Marvels." What is Ganderine? It is an occult distillation of the secret alembic of an unknown chemist who has lost the prescription and forgotten the formula.

[Laughter.]

Ganderine is duplex in its action and works while you sleep.

[Laughter.]

Shake it with the right hand and Ganderine removes hair from the scalp and wheels from the brain; shake it with the left hand and Ganderine puts wheels in the brain and hair on the scalp. A thorough course of left-handed treatment will install in an unoccupied brain an assortment of wheels that would have surprised the Prophet Ezekiel himself and develop on a fertile scalp Hyperian locks of such luxuriance as to create the appearance of distinction, produce a semblance of intellectuality, and confer upon shrinking modesty the majestic mien and front of Hyperian Jove.

Well, these advertisements for the rule of our life greet us on all hands, and yet who would have the temerity to suggest that either my colleague or myself had ever been induced to try Ganderine? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAINEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to his colleague?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. The time of my colleague is passing so rapidly I want to ask him if at any time during the hour he proposes to answer any argument I have advanced in either one of my speeches on this question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I would state, Mr. Chairman, if I had had the pleasure of hearing any argument of my colleague that was susceptible of a categorical reply, I would gladly answer it [applause on the Republican side], but I am coming now, Mr. Chairman, to something which I think may interest my colleague, and I have led up to it in this manner, so that I think your minds, gentlemen, are now in a proper state to receive what I have to say. When I thought how mysterious it was that that advertisement, over and above all others, had so impressed my colleague, I could hardly believe it, and I recurred to the RECORD to find out whether I remembered correctly, and on page 4910 I find:

My attention was first directed to this gentleman's business by advertisements which he inserted in the New York papers. * * * Inasmuch as this advertisement in the New York Press first directed my serious attention to the subject, I desire to send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

And he sent to the Clerk's desk to be read and inserted in the RECORD an advertisement from the New York Press, dated Friday morning, February 2, 1906. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] a short time before had inquired of my colleague whether the advertising picture was taken at the instance of Mr. Keene, to which my colleague replied:

The advertising picture was taken at my instance, at my request, and by my photographer, and I expect to pay for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Note the date. February 2 was the first date at which his attention was called to this matter. After that, of course, he had this picture taken, unless all through this proceeding he has been acting like the characters in Alice Through the Looking Glass. You remember that the Red Queen screamed, to Alice's amazement, when nothing had happened to her, and she told Alice that she was going to prick her finger after a while.

Remember these dates. February 2. Remember his photographer took this picture after that date, and remember what a photograph is. It is a portrait, painted by the sun, as instantaneous as a flash of lightning, and the face of nature changes again and can never be reproduced. A few days ago some designing person sent to the Ways and Means Committee a bundle of papers, which I ask you gentlemen to look at, the Free Trade Broadside, published, where we naturally would expect, in Boston. It is volume 1, No. 4, dated January, 1906. The front page of that paper contains what the ordinary man without a sense of humor would say was the photograph from which my colleague's print was reproduced. This Broadside also contains an article upon "Keene, of Broadway;" but bear in mind the positive statement of my colleague about this photograph. Let me read the first line of this article: "This picture was taken expressly for the Free Trade Broadside," and it must have been prior to January, 1906. [Applause on the Republican side.] It represents the store at No. 180 Broadway. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I were like my colleague, who last night descended into the dismal vale of melodrama, I should be justified in ascending into the arid heights of tragedy and demanding to know how there could be such a similarity between a picture taken before January 1 and one taken after February 2. If my colleague had not seen this picture, then certainly there was almost a miracle in the similarity in the position of Keene's clerks and salesmen as arranged by his photographer. If he had seen it, it certainly was a very artistic arrangement by which he could bring them into that exact position, and with that same newsboy in front. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to adhere strictly to the spirit of good humor that should pervade this play. And I pass on now to consider the attempt of my colleague to rehabilitate Keene, of Broadway—the sole source of his inspiration and information on the watch trade. Hence, again, I must remind you of the theme of this play—"Government by advertisements."

I have here an advertisement of "Keene, of Broadway," dated May 4, in the Globe and Commercial Advertiser, in which he says:

In defiance to the trusts I have been buying Waltham and Elgin watches by the thousands in the open markets of Europe—

And so forth.

To illustrate the lines upon which the fight is being waged, and to emphasize the almost incredible saving in the price of watch-trust products, I submit the following object lesson.

And I hand around these papers for gentlemen of the committee to look at. There are four watches shown in this advertisement. At the right-hand side is a watch marked "Waltham," an open-faced watch, with the figure "3" at the stem. On the face of it a hunting watch inserted in an open case—a nondescript affair which would make a man seasick to tell the time by. "Complete," he says, "for $4.98." No sane man would give 49 cents for it.

The second watch has a left-handed case, the like of which I never have seen, but which when you open it has the figure VI at the top. Another amorphus freak in the watch line. In order to tell the time a man should have to stand on his head, take the watch out of his pocket in his left hand, and look at it in a looking-glass. [Laughter.] For $9.98! No sober man would give 99 cents for it. And then comes two which I must take together. You can see that they are both numbered 9502001. The first is a Waltham, Riverside, seventeen jewelers. No American watch company—and we ought to be proud of it—no American watch company—there are twelve of them—is afraid of its movements or the names of them. And every watch has a number. Each watch has a number, and no number is duplicated. Look at the watch at the left hand in the advertisement and you find the same number as in the one next to it. It is a Riverside watch, with the same number, but by a forgery in the plate seventeen jewels have been changed to twenty-seven, and Maximus has been put in under Riverside.

Another little example of advertising of this unspeakable mountebank of lower Broadway! I had here an advertisement published by Keene only a few weeks ago, telling us how he had bought thousands of these watches in the European market. I want to call your attention to an original letter which I have here from Joseph Linz & Bros., wholesale jewelers, of Dallas, Texas. If the representative of the Dallas district is here—perhaps any Texas man can tell us whether it is not one of the best-known jobbing houses in his State. This firm incloses to the Elgin Watch Company, their correspondent, two letters from this man Keene. I will read from one of them:

Can you furnish us with any 16-size O. F. 7J Waltham or Elgin movements at 10 per cent and 6 per cent off for spot cash?

Postscript: Also let us know how many No. 210 Waltham O. F. and No. 303 Elgin movements you can send us.

That letter was dated September 8, 1905. Another letter is dated November 27, 1905, and is as follows:

Can you get me any R. R. grades of Waltham and Elgin at 10 and 6 per cent off, or any No. 1 Waltham, hunting or open face, or same thing in Elgin, less 10 per cent and 6 per cent? I will take several hundred of these for cash or give you other scarce goods in exchange.

How do gentlemen from Texas like to have their State called a "foreign country" by this Broadway advertiser, gulling the people by telling them he has reimported thousands of these watches from Europe, while he is writing to responsible dealers all over the country, even as far as Texas, offering to buy all of these watches that they can furnish for cash at the regular jobbers' rates and describing them as scarce goods?

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another and a darker chapter in the advertising of Keene. In March, 1900, this advertisement appeared in the New York Evening Telegram:

Watches—A Waltham watch cheap. A man on the inside will give confidential wholesale prices. Box 184, Waltham, Mass.

Now, I ask any fair-minded man what he would infer from that advertisement? The name of Waltham is known around the globe. There is no civilized man to whom the name of Waltham does not suggest a good watch. So when that advertisement appeared "Box 184, Waltham, Mass.," "a man on the inside will give confidential wholesale price," what is the supposition? What would any of you think? Well, the Waltham Watch Company people thought that some sly thief was getting into their works and stealing their movements, and they answered this advertisement. And who do you suppose replied to the letter? Would you have thought it would have been a typical Democrat?

Now, that advertisement to write to Box 184, Waltham, Mass., was answered by Mr. George Dill, of Maywood, N. J., and on March 31, 1900, and on April 13, 1900, his letters were answered by Charles A. Keene, dating his letters from Boston. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] His letter heads read "Keene's Mammoth Watch House, 1301 Washington street, Boston; New York, 140 Fulton street." That was before he got on to lower Broadway, which I remind my colleague, by the way, is the home of high finance; and the lower you get on Broadway the higher becomes the finance. [Laughter.] And to this same man, Mr. Dill, he also sent a catalogue, on the back page of which appears a sketch of a $50 Waltham watch, which he is willing to sell at less than half price. So that he was in this same kind of business of cajoling the public long before he had discovered that the people could be gulled and deceived by advertisements in reference to the cheapness of reimported watches. This method of advertisement, if called to the attention of the Post-Office Department, would at once close the mails to this typical Democrat, this friend of my colleague, this inspiration and source of all his information on the subject of the watch trust. [Applause on the Republican side.] As I listened last night to my colleague giving those ponderously positive, bombastic statements, which can only have their wellspring in misinformation, I could not help thinking that, as he stood like a watchman on the outside ramparts of the trade, he could tell us what cut prices on diamonds were, which I had always supposed were valued like bullion; and the first lines of that old hymn came to my mind:

Watchman, tell us of the night,
What its signs of promise are?

And if I had the lyrical capacity I would close this scene with appropriate lines; but in the short time at my disposal the best that I could do to fit the occasion was this:

Watchman, tell us of your friend,
What his signs of promise mean;
Can you really, truly buy
Cut-rate diamonds of Keene?

And if cut-rate diamonds
At Keene's are really sold,
Then why not cut-rate silver
And cut-rate bars of gold?

Watchman, tell us of the trade,
That our funds we may not waste;
Are cut-rate diamonds smuggled,
Or are they simply paste?

Watchman, tell us yet again,
What these signs of promise mean;
Which seems now the bigger fraud,
The diamonds, or Keene?

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, exit Keene, of Broadway; enter on the the right, Mr. Dueber, of Canton, a soured, litigious, and disaffected manufacturer; Mr. Johnston, of Pittsburg, a disgruntled jobber. Low, sobbing music, and a twilight effect. Enter on the left, other disgruntled manfacturers, jobbers, and retailers. They approach my colleague in the center of the stage and lay down at his feet a large assortment of petty grouches, and beseech him to unload them upon the House of Representatives. He looks nervously and apprehensively around to see what the gentleman from Mississippi says, and as he gives him a reassuring nod, then with a tremendous blare of trumpets and trombones the curtain falls to rise again upon these new characters.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. BOUTELL. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I simply want to advise my colleague of a matter he seems to be ignorant of.

Mr. DALZELL. He knows a lot.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will yield just for a short question, but I think I ought not to yield any more.

Mr. RAINEY. This afternoon, by unanimous consent, a distinguished Republican Member from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] put an appendix onto my speech, indorsing very strongly the character of Mr. Johnston, who lives in his town.

Mr. BOUTELL. I am glad he has indorsed the character of Mr. Johnston, because I had some doubt about it; but now that he has been fully indorsed, I will refer to Mr. Johnston, of Pittsburg. And he comes, Mr. Chairman, enveloped in the swirling clouds of a thousand factories, and with his face illuminated by the bright lights from a thousand forges; for he comes from Pittsburg. I do not know whether he comes in here to advance my colleague's main contention that the tariff on watches should be repealed, or not. If he does, he is the first manufacturer or jobber in Pittsburg that I ever heard advocate such a change in our laws; but I understand that Mr. Johnston, of Pittsburg, is a disgruntled jobber, who is attempting to furnish my colleague and others some proof in reference to the existence of a watch trust. I am sorry that my colleague did not have more time last night. I am sorry that he had to print his views about Johnston instead of telling them on the floor, so that I could have interrogated him. I understand, however, that Mr. Johnston claims that he has been discriminated against by some of these companies constituting the so-called "watch trust." There is no trust, either in the legal acceptation of the term or even in the popular significance. I do not know who the watch manufacturers are to whom my colleague refers, except two. He has included the Elgin Watch Company, of my State, and the Waltham Watch Company, of Massachusetts, and I understand it is the claim of Johnston that, dating back to last June, they have been deprived of the right to handle the Elgin and Waltham watches. I have here in my hand a price list and letter to the retail trade by Mr. Johnston, of Pittsburg, showing the watch companies that he represents, and three closely printed pages are devoted to each of the Waltham and the Elgin companies, giving all their standard movements at the regular prices and the regular discounts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Another thing that Mr. Johnston, whom we are told is a trustworthy man and well vouched for, tells us in this catalogue is that the best and most artistic watches made in the country are the Dueber-Hampden watches, and that the best railroad watches made in the country are the Hamilton watches, so what effect can a watch trust that does not include these two companies have upon him?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for which the gentleman from Illinois was recognized has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for an hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been occupied by the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask that his time be extended for one hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to the time being extended, just so it does not go beyond the hour and a half.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, then, I ask that his time be extended for half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended half an hour?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that that side of the House occupied thirty-five minutes more this afternoon than we did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not make any difference to-night about that.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, it does not?

Mr. PAYNE. We will even it up before we adjourn, I announce to the gentleman now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not make any difference about that; but the gentleman is mistaken——

Mr. PAYNE. I will even it up with you before we adjourn. I give that announcement now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is that? I did not quite hear.

Mr. PAYNE. I announce that whether it makes any difference to you or not, I will even it up with you before we adjourn this session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, of course you can do that in the day with my consent, but at these night sessions, under the special order of the House, the time is equally divided between the two parties.

Mr. PAYNE. Not under special rules. You do not like to hear this. The gentleman does not like to hear this. That is the trouble with him. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DALZELL. Let us have the regular order. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman to order. He is out of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why didn't you call the gentleman from New York to order while he was howling like a wild demon around here, and all about nothing? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret that what seemed to me the necessity for alluding to some of these matters concerning the watch trade has taken so much time, but it did seem to me that at this hot and close evening session there might be some interest in them and some little divertisement. I did hope, however, to have an hour in which to discuss the tariff in a general way without interfering with any other gentleman who wished to talk to-night, and I regret that the plans of the gentleman from Mississippi will interfere with that.

I must therefore only speak with the greatest brevity of Dueber, the litigious watch manufacturer at Canton, whom my colleague brings into this discussion for the purpose of proving that there is a watch trust. I have here the records from the secretary of the only watch organization that ever existed in this country, formed in 1884, of which Dueber, of Canton, was one of the organizers, of which he was one of the first directors, of which he was the vice-president, and in which he took an active and earnest part in bringing the contract system to apply to all manufacturers, all jobbers, and all retailers in the country, and in maintaining uniform prices. The records of the meetings show his expulsion from the organization in 1887 as a traitor to his colleagues.

Since then, according to the published law reports, which everyone has access to, I find that he has taken all his troubles into all the courts that were open to him. He brought one suit in the State court of New York for a common-law conspiracy in restraint of trade against a number of these companies and was defeated in that. He brought another proceeding under the Sherman interstate-commerce act, reported in 55 Federal Reporter, and the demurrer was sustained by Judge Cox, of New York, on the ground that he had made no case of infringement of the Sherman Act.

Another case of Dueber is reported in 66 Federal Reporter, where he had the advantage of the decision in the former proceeding, and had modified his complaint accordingly. Assuming that all his statements were true, a demurrer to the complaint was sustained by that great jurist, Judge Lacombe, who rendered the decision in the court of appeals. And so, Mr. Chairman, the charge so positively made by my colleague—and I repeat his exact words from the RECORD—that "certain companies constitute the Big Four of the watch trust, and that each of these companies own stock in the other" has been absolutely unproved by my colleague in any way. There is nothing even to suggest the truth of such a statement, and I submit to the committee whether a Member of this House does not incur great risk to his reputation for justice and candor when he brings in here such blunt assertions in reference to corporations about which he has no positive information.

He tells me that he has written 200 letters to retail jewelers in this country asking whether there is such a thing as a watch trust. In reply to these 200 letters he has received 100 answers saying that the writers think that maybe there is a trust, and that they think such and such companies form it. I assume that these retailers at least are not members of the trust, so that their evidence is purely hearsay. According to the catalogue of Mr. Johnston, of Pittsburg, there are 30,000 retail jewelers in the country. One hundred is one-third of 1 per cent of 30,000, and so my colleague attempts to corroborate his statement by the hearsay evidence of one-third of 1 per cent of the class that he invokes as his chief witness. I would like to know what the other 99⅔ per cent would say.

I have copies of some of the letters which were sent to my colleague in reply to his circular letter which I take for granted he will not insert in the RECORD, and so I will take the liberty to do so. Mr. Chairman, I have also received unsolicited letters from nearly fifty jobbers of watches—letters in reference to this controversy which they had seen discussed in the papers—saying positively that there is no watch trust, no combination, or anything of that sort, and that if there were they would know it, and the jobbers are the men to be affected by any conspiracy in restraint of trade. There are 250 jobbers in the country, so I offer 20 per cent of this class as against my colleague, one-third of 1 per cent of the class upon which he depends. I will insert them all in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, in the language of the prince of dramatists, "our revels now are ended." I have used some of the language and some of the hyperbole of the playhouse in referring to the action and speeches of my colleague during the last three months in this discussion, not for our amusement, but to emphasize how futile it is for us to attempt in this House to base conclusions on great public questions upon advertisements in newspapers and upon the private grievances of disaffected men in the trade. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, to base any serious action on the airy bubbles that rise from the lurid imagination of sensational advertisers or float from the disordered fancy of disaffected merchants would be as wise and no wiser than it would be to erect a house upon a foundation of eggs—eggs redolent with the flavor of antiquity. [Laughter and applause.]

And now a few words, before my time expires, in reference to the actual condition of the watch industry in this country and the effect upon it of our protective tariff. It is clear that I shall have to forego the entire general discussion which I hoped to participate in this evening. I have here a little manuscript history of the watch industry in this country, written by the master mechanic of the Waltham Watch Company, the head workman in that institution, showing how a man named Dennison, a Yankee, a native of Maine, residing in Boston, first conceived the idea of making watches with interchangeable parts, and the difficulty he had in interesting capital in his enterprise. It shows how a few watches were made in Connecticut under the tariff of 1846, which fixed a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on watches, but that they could not compete with the cheaper labor of Europe. But in time Dennison interested enough capital to establish a business, which, after many vicissitudes, resulted in the founding of the Waltham Watch Company in 1856. That company has had fifty years of honorable struggle, sometimes facing failure and bankruptcy, which has resulted in final and triumphant success. The Elgin Watch Company, branched off from the Waltham Watch Company in 1866, was, so to speak, a child of that corporation. In 1864 the tariff on watches had been placed at 25 per cent ad valorem, where it so remained, even under the Wilson-Gorman Act, down to the Dingley Act of 1897, when in addition to the ad valorem duty certain specific duties were placed upon watches. Under this invigorating tariff the watch industries flourished in this country, so that there are now in this country twelve manufactories of watch movements and eighteen manufactories of watch cases, or thirty all together. Their total output is about 3,300,000 watches.

I have compiled the most accurate statistics that I can get from the Bureau of Statistics and from such of the watch manufacturers as have given me information, and these statistics show that during the last year we have been able to export about 300,000 watches, or about 9 per cent of our total product. As against these 300,000 watches that have been exported, over 700,000 Swiss watches are annually brought into this country. So that, in the opinion at least of the workers and mechanics in the watch factories, whose views I think I represent, there should be at the present time not only no repeal or reduction of the duty on watches, but a slight increase to prevent the successful competition of the cheaper made Swiss watches. And in this connection I wish to say to my colleague, who had such violent assertions to make in reference to the parties that he represented in this discussion and the parties that I represented, that surely upon reflection he will wish to modify his language. I represent no one; he represents no one. Surely he would not admit that in any accurate sense of the term he represents Keene, of Broadway.

What's Hecuba to him or he to Hecuba
That he should weep for her?

Neither do I in any sense represent anybody or anything in this discussion, but the absolute truth as I can get it and as it comes to me unsolicited; and the truth of this whole business is, so far as I can get at it, that there is no better, cleaner, industry in this country than the watch industry to-day; no industry in which there is more perfect rivalry among these thirty institutions engaged in turning out 3,300,000 watches.

I would like to ask any of the gentlemen present who are acquainted with business methods and manufacturing enterprises whether there is any other industry where there are thirty factories engaged in turning out 3,300,000 units of the average value of watches? I do not believe there is any example in the United States in any of the great industries of a more healthy rivalry than that which prevails in the watch industry, and yet my colleague, without a bit of corroborative evidence, sees fit to attack grossly the reorganization of the Waltham Company. I know nothing about this except what I have seen in the public press. I was interested in it because what I saw confirmed the statement of the officers of that company, which I submitted here some weeks ago, that the stock at that time, instead of being watered, was worth 285 cents on the dollar and was paying a dividend of 10 per cent. Is there anything culpable in that? The stock had been placed at four millions in 1885 by special act of the legislature of the State of Massachusetts, under a strict law requiring all of the capital to be paid in in full in cash and requiring the commissioner of corporations to so certify. They have now reorganized the company, or, as I understood the accounts, they have organized a new company, with $12,000,000 of stock, $1,000,000 to be paid in cash, eleven millions to be exchanged for the four million worth 285 cents on the dollar. Is not that a splendid showing of the ingenuity, of the industry, of the economy, of the thrift, and of the sagacity of the men who established the Waltham Company?

Does my colleague complain of success? Are there not many instances of success like that in his beautiful district in Illinois? Does he think them culpable or heinous? Let me call his attention to the fact that the State banks and private banks throughout the United States pay a larger average dividend than the Waltham Company has ever paid, some of them as high as 70 per cent annually. I know of one bank in my colleague's own district that pays 10 per cent semiannually simply on the wise and discreet loaning of money. The value of the Waltham Company stock is based upon patents, upon good will, upon trade-marks and trade-names that have been increasing in value for many years, as well as cash, material, stock, and real estate. Instead of there being anything heinous or culpable about that, is it not something for those men to be proud of, that all the men engaged in it, and as shown by one of the mechanics, the stock books of the Waltham Company have been always open to the employees of the company, and many of them stand now as stockholders and derive a beneficial interest from this increase in the value of the stock?

Have we come to such a pitch in this country, Mr. Chairman, has such a wave of hysteria swept over this country that we must say, "Whatever is is wrong; whoever succeeds, hit him on the head, and that the ogres and goblins of finance dominate all our manufacturing enterprises?" Mr. Chairman, I do not look at our industrial situation with such a "dropping eye," and I am surprised to find a man like my colleague, from the district he represents, taking such a view of such a splendid industry, represented in our own State not only by the Elgin Company, but by the Illinois Company, at Springfield, and by the Rockford Company, at Rockford, Illinois.

Again, I have just received to-day from the secretary of state of Massachusetts a document which I sent for when I had read my colleague's speech in the paper three weeks ago, a certified copy of the articles of incorporation of this new company, and I find by referring to the statute of Massachusetts that any company organized there has to satisfy the corporation commissioner that the amount of stock issued is represented either by cash or by property tangible or intangible having a cash value equal to the stock. He read here last night affidavits of the officers of the Waltham company of their return for taxation simply scheduling patent rights at, I think, $180,000. Then he said that in organizing this company they had scheduled the patent rights at over $4,000,000. I have the certificate here, and what they schedule at $4,500,000 was patent rights, which are all that are taxable under the Massachusetts law, and therefore the only thing referred to in the affidavit read by my colleague—plus trade-marks, plus good will—and the good will of the Waltham company is worth more than all its tangible property put together. [Applause on the Republican side.] And that certificate, Mr. Chairman, bears on its front the certificate of the corporation commissioner of the State of Massachusetts, saying that the laws of that Commonwealth have been complied with, and signed William D. T. Trefry, commissioner of corporations, and if there is any Massachusetts man here on the other side of the House, I want him to say who Mr. Trefry, of Massachusetts, is.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Trefry is a Democrat.

Mr. BOUTELL. He is not only a Democrat, but he is a Democrat who ran with Russell, whom his Democratic friends lovingly referred to as "Billy Russell," for the office of auditor of Massachusetts, and was overwhelmingly elected. He was afterwards appointed to an administrative office by Governor Russell as a Democrat and reappointed commissioner of corporations by Governor Douglass, the great tariff reformer and trust buster of the Democratic party. This Democrat of the highest integrity certifies that all of those provisions of the State of Massachusetts have been faithfully complied with, and that the organization for $12,000,000 is in accordance with the laws of that old Commonwealth. [Applause on the Republican side.] So when my colleague attacks that organization and attacks those men he stands there confessedly attacking the administration of the law in the grand old Commonwealth of Massachusetts by Democratic officials——

Mr. RAINEY rose.

Mr. BOUTELL. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman. Now I raise the question again, Why is it that my colleague, of all persons in the world, should take such a singular view of this situation? I have no particular interest in it. I never met but one officer of each of these companies, and one of them I only met once; but all of this information came unsolicited into our committee room, and I am glad to avail myself of it, and as between believing Mr. Fitch, the president of the Waltham Company, who worked himself up from a position at the bench after forty years of labor to the presidency of this magnificent enterprise, between taking his word and presenting it as truth to the country, and taking the word of that palpable charlatan Keene, of Broadway, I stand by Mr. Fitch, of Massachusetts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, I can not for the life of me conceive why my colleague went into this matter in the way he has done. I can not imagine why he went into it in this spirit, of all the persons in the world. Do any of you know where my colleague comes from? He comes from that splendid district in my State that the old Indians called the "Sangamo country," the country of abundant plenty. There may be other lovely spots on earth, but there is only one Greene County, Illinois, and that is where my colleague comes from. Nowhere on earth are the fields more golden at harvest time; nowhere do the orchard boughs hang under a heavier load of fragrant fruit; nowhere do the birds sing more sweetly or the flowers exhale a more delightful perfume; nowhere are the men braver or more cheerful; nowhere are the women more beautiful or intelligent; nowhere do they have such ravishing roasted corn or such savory game chowder. I can not fittingly describe in words the happiness, the prosperity, and the content that reign supreme in Greene County. I can only illustrate it by an incident.

An old farmer and his wife who were born in Greene County, born on Apple River, in the year of the "great snow," owned acres upon acres of corn and wheat and orchards, with stock in the 20 per cent dividend Carrolton Bank. They were happy. They had brought up their children to all of the advantages of life, and they loved to travel. They were sailing one day down the Illinois River—and you must understand, gentlemen, that when the Illinois River touches the banks of Greene County it sings for very joy as it ripples over the gravel. Even the whistles of the steamboats play Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words as they go by Columbiana. [Laughter.] Even the boilers of the boats seem bursting with joy as they enter the waters of Greene County, and on this occasion they blew up, and everyone on board, including the farmer and his wife, met instant death. As the old gentleman and his wife came to in the New Jerusalem and found themselves sitting side by side on a flowery bank on the borders of a crystal stream and heard the heavenly music and the songs of birds, and saw the beautiful vistas of the trees of everlasting fruit, the good woman heaved a deep sigh of relief, and turning to her husband said: "Well, husband, we may be some miles from home, but, thank Heaven, we landed in Greene County." [Great laughter.]

And so I can not understand why it is that my colleague should be the only inhabitant of that splendid, prosperous region, who in this happy, prosperous time takes such a one-sided, prejudiced, dark, and clouded view of our present industrial conditions and of one of the best and healthiest industries in the State of Illinois and in the nation. [Loud and long-continued applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

APPENDIX—PART I.

THE WATCH INDUSTRY—RAILWAY WATCH INSPECTION.

I am glad to be able to print a letter disproving the disparaging charges made by my colleague against a class of honorable railroad employees.

J. W. FORSINGER,
RAILWAY TIME AND WATCH INSPECTION,
AMERICAN WATCHES AT WHOLESALE,
New York, June 29, 1906.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to a speech by Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY in the House of Representatives June 25, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In this speech Mr. RAINEY has made some astoundingly erroneous statements touching the system of railroad-watch inspection in the United States. I am now chief watch inspector for more than thirty-five railroad companies, covering upward of 30,000 miles, and have had twenty years' experience in this capacity. Mr. RAINEY's statements on the subject have no foundation in fact. He says: "In most cases where watch inspection is ordered, there is some graft in it somewhere." This statement is wholly unwarranted, so far as it applies to any of the railroads by which I am employed. He says the watch inspector "is really selected by the watch trust, but nominally * * * by the general superintendent."

My appointment to that office has always been without the knowledge of any watch-manufacturing concern or anyone connected with it. Furthermore, the chief watch inspector is not selected by the general superintendent, save, perhaps, in rare instances. The appointment is made by the president or the general manager of the road, and if at all by the general superintendent, it is so only by authority of either of the two higher officials. The conditions of the order are not dictated by the watch inspector, as Mr. RAINEY says, nor even suggested by him, except in so far as a technical or trade knowledge is requisite. Mr. RAINEY declares "if this order is made, no matter how good a watch may run, it is sure to be condemned if it does not comply with the order." I presume he meant to say no matter how well a watch might run. When official watch inspection is adopted by a railroad company, a circular is issued by an official of the company, wherein is specified the minimum standard of excellence adopted for watches to be used by the employees. This is almost invariably what is known as a "nickel 17-jeweled patent regulator movement," that is adjusted to heat, cold, and three positions, the variation of which must not exceed thirty seconds per week.

The railroads with which I am associated as watch inspector specify certain well-known, regularly manufactured makes and qualities of American watch movements to illustrate this minimum standard of excellence and to prevent either misunderstanding among inspectors or any imposition upon the employees. The roads of which I speak with knowledge, mention and accept the products of the Illinois Watch Company, the Waltham Watch Company, the Hampden Watch Company, the Hamilton Watch Company, and the Elgin National Watch Company. No preference is shown by me, as chief inspector, for any make of watch. Every employee exercises an untrammeled right in his selection of a watch from among those scheduled in the circular order issued by the railroad company. No employee is compelled to buy his watch from the company's inspector; he may obtain it where he pleases. It should also be noted that any watch in service at the time the inspection order is issued, and of a quality equal to the specified minimum standard of excellence, is accepted.

Mr. RAINEY declares that employees are required to buy watch movements, the value of which is fictitiously raised by special named dials or bridges. That statement is untrue as to the 30,000 miles of road of which I am chief inspector. Upon each and all of these roads the use of special named watches is forbidden unless they were previously in service. In nearly every instance the inspection order distinctly states that no watch specially made and named by or for any jeweler will be accepted. I quote from one of the inspection orders: "The intention of jewelers in offering watches specially made is generally understood to be for the purpose of removing the regular factory grade and name, thus enabling them to charge the employees a higher price for same."

I beg to remain, respectfully, yours,

J. W. FARSINGER.

Affidavit relating to sale of Elgin watches for export, showing the correctness of my statements, which the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Rainey, questions. (See first column, p. 9478, Congressional Record.)

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
County of Philadelphia, ss:

John F. Eisley, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I reside at 2632 Brown street, Philadelphia, Pa. I am manager of the export department of the Keystone Watch Case Company of that city. I have been in the employment of that company for nearly twenty years. The Keystone Watch Case Company is the export selling agent of the Elgin National Watch Company, of Elgin and Chicago, Ill., and has been such for about ten years. During that period no watch movements of the Elgin National Watch Company have been exported by that company except through the Keystone Watch Case Company as export selling agent. Since November, 1901, all Elgin movements exported to Europe have been sent by the Keystone Watch Case Company either to its London office or to its Hamburg office, and have been distributed from one or both of these offices. Two sets of records of all Elgin movements so exported have been kept since said date, November, 1901, as follows: All such movements, before being sent abroad, are entered in stock registers under descriptive headings, from which it can be ascertained with certainty just what movements and how many of any particular grade have been exported to said offices. After any watch movements are sold from the London or Hamburg offices, a carbon copy of every sales sheet is returned to the Philadelphia office. These are bound by months and can also be readily examined, and the number of watch movements of any particular grade sold from either of the London or Hamburg offices can be quickly determined with accuracy.

Deponent is quite familiar with both these sets of records, and has personally examined them from November, 1901, down to May 1, 1906, and the following statements are based upon deponent's examination of these records. The statement made by Mr. BOUTELL, in his speech delivered April 27, 1906, to the effect that since 1901 only thirty-seven of Elgin Veritas 21-jewel and Elgin Father Time movements in all had been exported to Europe was based upon an examination of the said records made by deponent in February, 1906. Having brought such examination down to May 1, 1906, deponent now states that since November, 1901, no Elgin B. W. Raymond 19-jewel movements and but three Elgin Veritas 23-jewel movements have been exported to Europe by either the Elgin company or the Keystone Watch Case Company, and only one of the above-mentioned 23-jewel Veritas movements has been reported as sold on the carbon copy of sales sheets returned to the Philadelphia office by either the London or Hamburg offices, and that only fifty-nine movements in all of the Elgin Veritas 21-jewel and Father Time movements have been in the same period exported to the London and Hamburg offices of the same companies conjointly. Out of this total of fifty-nine movements the sales sheets returned from the London and Hamburg offices show that up to the 26th day of April, 1906, only forty-six movements in all of the said Elgin Veritas 21 and 23 jewel and Elgin Father Time grades had been sold from these offices.

The statement made in the advertisement of Charles A. Keene, published in the Globe newspaper of New York on Friday, May 4, 1906, that the said Keene has been buying "Elgin watches by the thousands in the open markets of Europe," if intended to apply to the Elgin B. W. Raymond 19-jewel, Elgin Veritas 23-jewel, Elgin Veritas 21-jewel, the Elgin Father Time, or to any and all of the higher grades of movements made by the Elgin National Watch Company, is utterly false, since there have not been thousands of all the said high-grade movements collectively exported to Europe in the period of about ten years during which the Keystone Watch Case Company has been the export sales agent of the Elgin Company.

JOHN F. EISLEY,

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 9th day of May, 1906.

[SEAL] JOHN J. MANNICK,
Notary Public.

Letter from Mr. W. H. Cloudman to Mr. W. H. Kinna, agent of the Elgin Watch Company, showing how the former had been cheated by Keene, of Broadway.

BOSTON, MASS., May 15, 1906.

Mr. W. H. KINNA,
11 John street, New York.

MY DEAR MR. KINNA: I was in your city on the 10th instant, and wishing to get a watch for my boy dropped into the Keene jewelry store on Broadway, near John, having seen his advertisement in the papers, stating how cheaply he could sell an American-made watch.

The attendant gave me to understand that on account of their going to Europe for their Elgin and Waltham movements he could sell me at greatly reduced rates.

I finally purchased of him a No. 12 size Elgin watch, No. 11247867, with a twenty-year warranted gold-filled case, for $25 cash, the attendant assuring me that I was getting the watch at much less than I would have to pay at any other retail store.

Now I find that the jewelers are selling the same outfit with the same movements and case for from $6 to $8 less than I paid for it, and naturally feel very sore about it. I think I was imposed upon. I took a bill, and they promised to exchange the movement for a 19-jewel (this being 15) if I would at any time pay the difference of $10.

I believe that man Keene is not square, and I would not advise any of my friends to trade there. I will let you see the watch when I go over again.

Yours, truly,

W. H. CLOUDMAN.

Letters from two of the eighteen watch-case manufactories in the United States denying the existence of a "watch trust."

ROY WATCH CASE COMPANY,
21–23 Maiden Lane, New York, May 31, 1906.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been very much interested in reading your speech of April 26, 1906, in answer to Mr. RAINEY, and beg to state that we are one of the largest exclusive gold case manufacturers in this country, doing business with the majority of the largest jobbers throughout the country, also with the largest jobbers in other countries.

We have always selected our list of jobbers, with whom we have been doing business for a great number of years, and have been free to state to our customers that we know nothing of the so-called "watch trust," and have known for a fact that there has been no trust, or no so-called "trust" of the watch movement manufacturers or the watch case manufacturers.

We have sold our cases to jobbers who are handling movements of the largest manufacturers in the country, and are casing these movements in our cases, and our business has been steadily increasing, and have been selling as many goods as we have been able to manufacture to our jobbers, although the competition has been somewhat keen with the different watch case manufacturers as regards quality and workmanship, but we have been able to prove to our customers that our quality and workmanship have been superior to the cheap class of goods that have been put on the market. In that way we have been able to sell our output, which will prove to you there is no watch trust in existence.

We remain, yours, very truly,

ROY WATCH CASE COMPANY.
A. L. STEARNS, President.

DUBOIS WATCH CASE COMPANY,
MANUFACTURERS OF FINE SOLID GOLD WATCH CASES,
Brooklyn, June 2, 1906.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having read the pamphlet containing your speech in denial of the existence of a trust in the watch trade of this country, we wish to add our mite in the cause of right as follows:

Our corporation has been in business for thirty years, and during that period has had dealings with most of the concerns in our trade from time to time.

State that we do not know of our own knowledge and belief of the existence of any such trust.

In conclusion wish to say that any change in the tariff from present conditions will be, in our opinion, very detrimental to the watch business of this country.

Yours, respectfully,

DUBOIS WATCH CASE CO.,

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] invokes the hearsay evidence of retail jewelers to substantiate his assertion that the Waltham and Elgin companies are members of a trust. Mr. W. J. Johnston, upon whom the gentleman from Illinois relies for much of his information, says in his printed circular to the trade that there are 30,000 retail jewelers in the United States. According to figures given in some of the trade journals 23,000 would be a more accurate estimate.

The gentleman from Illinois says that he has received letters from 105 retailers indicating that there is a "watch trust." This number is less than one-half of 1 per cent of the members of the class that he calls as a witness.

He publishes fifty-seven such letters, or less than one-quarter of 1 per cent.

Here are a few letters from the 99⅞ per cent of this class that the gentleman from Illinois received but did not print.

His letter to the retailers being a circular letter, those who replied were entitled to have their replies made public and treated as circular letters for public distribution.

Letters from retailers.

CHARLES E. GRAVES & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
Chicago, May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washingon, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been interested in following your speech, and the subsequent reply of the Hon. Mr. BOUTELL, and we have felt that we should give you some information from the retail jeweler's point of view.

In the first place, we have no knowledge of any watch trust or combination, nor have we in any way ever been approached by any manufacturer to adopt a policy which would be injurious to any other manufacturer's business.

As we have handled a general line of watches, both of foreign and domestic make, since 1857, we feel very positive that if there had been any movement on foot among any of the manufacturers to advance prices beyond a reasonable profit it would have been brought to our notice.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES E. GRAVES & CO.

THE NEVIUS COMPANY,
New York, May 8, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A dealer has shown me a copy of a letter from you inquiring about a watch trust. If there is a combination or trust in the trade, I have no personal knowledge of its exisence, and I am not aware that it has ever interfered with or dictated our buying watches in the market as we have chosen. If there is such a combination as "The Big Four" I could not name the firms which compose it.

Yours, very sincerely,

BENJ. C. NEVIUS,
Secretary and Treasurer.

LOUIS MANHEIMER & BROS.,
Chicago, May 8, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your lines of April 30, and will state in reply that we know of no watch trust of any kind.

We deal largely and exclusively in American watches and buy of and sell to whom we see fit; as a matter of fact, we buy of every case and movement manufacturer in this country.

Yours, respectfully,

LOUIS MANHEIMER & BROS.

MAY 16, 1906.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 11th, we have to say that we have been buying and selling watch movements and cases of all American and foreign manufacture for ourselves for the past thirty years, and prior to that for firms by whom we were employed for, say, seven years.

In all that time any jobbers who have been dropped from the lists of manufacturers, so far as our opinion goes, has been for the best interests of both manufacturers and jobbers, and so far as we are concerned, "all channels have always been open to us."

Yours, respectfully,

LAPP & FLERSHEM.

H. FIELD, WATCHMAKER AND JEWELER,
Chicago, May 8, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From my practical experience in the watch business, I beg to state that I know nothing about any trust, combination, or "Big 4" mentioned in your circular letter, and repeated reductions in price of watch movements show that there is strong competition.

H. FIELD.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY.

SIR: Your note of May 1 reached me several days ago, and in reply to your questions will say that I know of no trust or combination in the watch trade. I know nothing of any "Big 4" except what I have seen in print.

I am reading your speech in the House, and I can not quite agree with you on American watches; the profit on them is entirely too small. I can not afford to handle them to any great extent. I think the contract plan if carried out faithfully is a step in the right direction; it does no more than give the retail jeweler a fair profit on his sale on that class of goods, and would like to see it applied to all kinds of American watches.

You say that I am interested in this matter. I am, to know how the jeweler can make a living profit by selling American watches at the low price they are selling at to-day.

Respectfully, yours,

J. M. HENWOOD.

JOHN C. LEPPERT, WATCHES, DIAMONDS, JEWELRY,
Chicago, May 8, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With a practical experience in the watch business of over thirty years, I know of no combination or trust existing among the manufacturers. Many and repeated reductions in the price of watches have brought them down to a figure 50 per cent less than twenty years ago, and of a superior quality and workmanship than ever.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN C. LEPPERT.

CHICAGO, May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington.

DEAR SIR: We have seen you circular letter to the retail jewelers, asking if there is a combination or trust among the watch factories, and beg to state that I know nothing about the Big 4 mentioned, and to the best of my knowledge there is no watch trust or combination.

Yours, truly,

J. S. TOWNSEND.

CHICAGO, May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your circular letter of the 30th of April, we beg to say we do not know of any trust or combination in the watch trade, nor of any organization known as the "Big 4."

From our dealings with the great watch-manufacturing concerns in this country, we are led to believe their methods of doing business benefit the retailer rather than injure him.

Yours, truly,

SPAULDING & CO.

A. J. YOUNGDAHL,
JEWELER AND WATCHMAKER,
Chicago, May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having seen your circular letter in regard to the Elgin and Waltham watch companies, and beg to say that I know nothing about any trust or combination between above-mentioned concerns.

Yours, respectfully,

A. J. YOUNGDAHL.

PERKINS & MAYERS,
DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY, AND SILVERWARE,
New York, May 7, 1906.

Hon. H. J. RAINEY, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have seen copy of letter sent by you to retail dealers.

We have been selling watches for fifteen years; have heard of no trust or combination of manufacturers in the watch trade, except what has been said in the papers recently.

Yours, respectfully,

PERKINS & MAYERS.

J. KLEM, WATCHES, DIAMONDS, AND JEWELRY,
Rochester, May 15, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your circular letter of the 30th ultimo, would say that during the period of thirty-one years we have been in the watch and jewelry business we have never known of any trust or combination to exist among the watch manufacturers of the United States.

There is not within our knowledge or experience any such organization as the "Big Four," nor does there appear to be any collusion between the various manufacturers.

The fact that they are almost universally represented by high salaried and efficient traveling salesmen would disabuse the mind of any idea of mutual agreement. In fact the competition in the watch trade to-day is so active that the retailer is obliged to accept a profit equal to about 8 per cent less than the dealer in boots and shoes and similar commodities.

If the matter under debate in the House of Representatives has for its ultimate object the reduction or abolition of the protective duty on foreign watches, we desire to express the opinion that the introduction of a cheap, unbranded result of underpaid juvenile labor into this country would be a detriment to the best interests, not only of the manufacturer and retailer, but to the public at large.

Respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH KLEM.

S. C. MCKNIGHT, JEWELER AND WATCHMAKER,
Chicago, May 8, 1906.

Hon. H. T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your circular letter under date of April 30, relating to watch combine or "trust" known as the "Big Four," I will state that, as far as any personal knowledge is concerned, there is no such organization. As far as my information upon the subject extends, the only tendency in the line of a combine is a friendly understanding existing among the leading watch manufacturers of this country whereby the interests of both the manufacturer and the dealer are protected to the material betterment of general trade conditions.

Very respectfully, yours, S. C. MCKNIGHT,

Letters from jobbers.

There are 250 wholesale jewelers or jobbers in the United States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] prints letters from eight of these jobbers, who assume that there is a "watch trust." It seems unnecessary to suggest that trusts are not the only parties who decline to deal with undesirable customers and drop such from their lists. Even a gentle, kindly minded individual might, if he were a fairly shrewd business man, refuse to sell goods to a man who failed to pay his bills or who, for other reasons, was an unprofitable customer.

Here are forty-three letters and one telegram from leading jobbers in the jewelry trade that have come to me unsolicited during the past month, and I insert all the letters that have come to me on this subject.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have read with satisfaction your recent speech in Congress in answer to one delivered by Mr. RAINEY, who endeavored to show the existence of a watch trust in this country.

We are sure that had Mr. RAINEY interviewed the leading houses in New York and Chicago who are engaged in the wholesale watch business he would never have reached the conclusions expressed by him. We have been for the past thirty years large handlers of the products of the Waltham and Elgin watch companies, and we are yet to know of the existence of a watch trust in these United States. There could not have been one without our knowledge. We buy of other watch movements companies, who compete with the products of the Waltham and Elgin companies, and we deal with the products of the Waltham and Elgin companies; and we deal in these goods without restraint or interference, either directly or indirectly exercised or attempted by either of the watch companies above mentioned. In fact, we buy from whom and where we please, and, in doing so, we take only our own interests into consideration.

We beg to remain, dear sir, yours, respectfully,

DEAR SIR: Having been directly in the watch business for over twenty-five years, we were very much interested in your speech delivered in the House of Representatives on April 26. We do not know of a so-called "watch trust." We are selling the product of six American watch manufacturers, and have always found them competing strongly with each other. We also carry Swiss watches. We consider the watch market an open one, and we buy what we want, whether American or foreign manufacture. Competition is very keen between the different manufactures, as is shown by the prices that are now in effect.

Yours, very truly,

WOODSTOCK-HOEFER WATCH AND JEWELRY COMPANY.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: We have noticed several articles in the newspapers of late, giving what purported to be accounts of discussions in Congress relative to watch trusts, combinations, restraint of trade, lack of competition, etc. Would say that as far as we are concerned we find an unlimited amount of competition, at times in fact more than is good for us. We buy from the Elgin and Waltham watch companies and have done so for years; we also buy and sell imported watches and watch movements and complete watches and watch movements made by nine other American manufacturers. We buy them as freely as we can afford and sell them as openly and as rapidly as possible.

Trusting that this information will be of service to you, we are,

Yours, truly,

Hon. HY. S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: From various sources we learn there is an intention to establish the existence of a watch trust. Our business relations with the members of the so-called "trust," covering a period of a quarter of a century, does not verify a single fact on which to base this assertion.

We do business with every watch manufacturer in the United States, with no attempt on the part of any individual manufacturer to restrict our business with another.

Competition between these various manufacturers is such in the face of the largest demand for watches during the past six years prices, considering quality, are comparatively lower than at any other period. We purchase from whom we please, sell to whom we please, and at prices to conform with percentage necessary to conduct our business.

Very respectfully,

DEAR SIR: We have read with much interest the speech delivered by you in the House of Representatives April 26, together with a great many comments regarding the watch industry, and therefore take the liberty of addressing you regarding same. It may be possible that we do not know or understand the full meaning of the words "trust" or "combination," but to our knowledge no such terms would apply to the watch business. We have been established here in the jewelry business since 1882, and have never known competition to be so fierce as it is at the present time. We handle several lines of American watches, and at no time have any of the manufacturers tried to dictate to us what lines we could or could not buy. We are, and always have been, free agents, buying such watches as best suits our needs.

Trusting that this information may be of benefit to you, we remain,

Hon. H. T. BOUTELL, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The writer has been greatly interested in reading your speech in the House of Representatives on the tariff on watches.

We, as a firm, are very glad the subject-matter pertaining to the watch trust has been agitated and brought before the public.

Our firm has been in the jobbing business for about thirty years and has handled American lines of watches during all this time. Our relations with the Elgin and Waltham companies have been of the most cordial at all times, although we have always acted independent.

In the history of our business career we have never known of a watch trust, and know of none to-day, and we believe we are in position, should there be a watch trust, to know exactly what the relations would be with the very best of jobbers.

As above stated, our relations have always been the most cordial, and we can frankly state we have at no time been approached or threatened by either company desiring us to handle only their manufacture.

We handle other lines to-day, and propose to do so as long as we are in business. We believe this question of a watch trust is entirely false, and is only hatched up by new people who are coming into the field.

Wishing you success, we are,

Very truly, yours,

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since Mr. RAINEY'S speech in regard to the tariff on watches we have been very much interested in reading all that has been said by Mr. RAINEY, yourself, and others. We are at a loss to understand how anyone who is at all acquainted with the manufacture of watch movements and cases, also the selling of same by the jobber and the retailer, can come to the conclusion that there is any watch trust or restriction in the buying and selling of watch cases and movements.

Speaking for ourselves, would say that we are at liberty to buy and sell watch movements and watch cases made by any manufacturer, either in the United States or abroad. We find the competition among the manufacturers of these lines to be very keen.

In buying goods of the manufacturer and selling to the retail trade we try to buy the best goods and the goods most sought for by the legitimate retail trade.

Respectfully, yours,

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have been shown letters written by the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY to some of the jobbers or wholesale dealers in American watches in which he says that he is investigating the "watch trust," and that he is anxious to find out what jobbers have been dropped from the lists of what he calls the "allied companies," giving as a reason for their being dropped that they handled "independent goods."

We have been in the wholesale jewelry business for nearly forty years and for the past twenty-five years have been handling American watches very largely. We employ a large number of traveling representatives and reach every State in the Union. We buy largely from the manufacturers of both watch movements and watch cases whom Mr. RAINEY designates as the "watch trust." We also buy other makes of watch movements and cases where we find it profitable to do so, and we know that we can continue to buy any makes of watch movements or cases without interfering with our supply of goods from the so-called "watch trust."

In our opinion, the whole talk about there being a "watch trust" is ridiculously absurd. Possibly there may be jobbers who can not buy everything they would like to carry, but if so, it is not because of any discrimination made against them for buying any legitimate line of goods. In our business, as in all others, there are numerous malcontents who seem more anxious to dispense "hot air," so called, than they do to attend strictly to their legitimate business.

If there is a "watch trust" we know nothing of its existence.

Very respectfully, yours,

C. G. ALFORD & CO.

HONORABLE SIR: According to newspaper reports, a controversy has arisen in the United States Congress regarding a watch trust in this country. We are dealing, and have been for years and years, in American watches of all descriptions, which we are selling to-day, and we do not know of any cause why we should not uphold the American manufacturers, as the prices for the last ten years have been gradually reduced and the quality of goods improved, and to our best knowledge and belief we do not know of any existing trust in that direction. The competition in our line is very keen, and we are compelled to handle all kinds of watch movements in order to meet same, and while we admit that the Waltham and Elgin makes have the preference among the dealers, yet we do not know of any restrictions in regard to selling the products of other companies.

Very respectfully, yours,

DEAR SIR: We have carefully read the speech made by you in answer to your colleague, Mr. RAINEY, and have also read Mr. RAINEY'S contention of the existence of a watch trust in the United States. We have been jobbers in American watches for a quarter of a century or more, and this is the first time we have been told that there is a watch trust in existence. Throughout this period we have handled nearly every make of American watches, but there has never at any time been any pressure brought to bear upon us in favor of any particular make of goods, and we consider ourselves free and independent jobbers, and do and would buy any goods that we choose.

Yours, respectfully,

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: We have read with a great deal of interest your reply to Mr. RAINEY'S speech on the watch question, and wish to express our pleasure at your exposure of the misinformation supplied by Mr. Keene, in New York.

Our firm has been in the wholesale jewelry business for more than fifty years, and has been selling Elgin and Waltham movements since these movements were first put on the market, and we know, of our own knowledge, that there is not any such thing as a watch trust. Both the Elgin and Waltham companies are now, and always have been, in active competition for our business, and while a large part of our watch sales is of these two makes we do handle and sell quite a number of movements made by other manufacturers.

It is the sentiment of our customers, almost without exception, that the fixed retail price adopted by the Elgin and Waltham companies on railroad movements is an advance step in the policy of the companies interested and that it acts for the best interest of both the retail jeweler and the consumer, and that the trade of the country and the general public would be better off if it could be adopted for all grades of movements.

It fixes a fair price for the watches, which enables the jeweler to make a living profit, no more, and prevents the dishonest dealer from charging his customers an exorbitant price.

The Elgin and Waltham companies were the last of the American watch manufacturers to put a fixed retail price on their railroad grades, and were forced into doing it by loss of business.

DEAR SIR: We have noticed in the press a number of statements in regard to the so-called "watch trust."

We have been in the watch and jewelry business many years, and so far as we know there is no trust among the watch manufacturers. We ourselves handle a number of different makes of these goods, both movements and cases. We buy the goods on which we think we can make the most money, and we are governed in making our selections by the quality, price, and demand.

We write this letter in justice to certain manufacturers, concerning whom we understand certain charges have been made in Congress.

DEAR SIR: We have read your speech in reply to one delivered by Congressman Rainey on the subject of "Tariff on Watches." We noted particularly the endeavor of Mr. Rainey to prove the existence of a watch trust in the United States.

We have been engaged in the wholesale watch business during the past fourteen years, and to our knowledge there is not now, and never has there been, a watch trust in this country.

During our business career we have handled the products of a great many different watch factories, and we are now handling those watches for which we have the largest demand and which afford us the greatest profit.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your attention to a matter which is of much importance to all jobbers of American watches in the United States. I refer to the statement made by Representative RAINEY relative to American manufacturers of watches, "the watch trust," so-called, etc.

As a representative jobber and in justice to the manufacturers, I desire to state that in my opinion there is no such thing as a "watch trust." I know positively that there is competition between the manufacturers.

Furthermore, I handle all makes of American watches, and there has never been any pressure brought to bear upon me to restrict my purchases either in movements or cases. I do a large business both at my New York and Chicago offices, and have felt perfectly free to buy wherever I saw fit.

DEAR SIR: We have read with great interest the speech delivered by you in Congress recently on the subject of watch combinations, which struck us with the idea that there is an impression somewhere that there is a combination of watch manufacturers existing at the present time which is supposed to control our action in reference to handling watches, and we take the liberty to address these few lines to you giving you our experience in this matter.

We have been engaged in this business for forty years and we know of no combination existing which in any way controls us in buying our goods in this line. We are absolutely uncontrolled in regard to our purchases of watches, and are simply guided by the quality, demand, and stability of the goods. While we have always handled certain lines of goods we are aware of the fact that for the past twenty or twenty-five years there has been a constant endeavor on the part of certain manufacturers whose goods the leading jobbers do not handle, to create an impression amongst the public that there is a watch trust, which controls the principal output of American watches. But so far as our knowledge goes, as already stated above, we know of absolutely no such combination, and are free to buy our goods wherever we see fit.

Trusting that this may assist you in correcting a wrong impression in reference to this matter, we remain,

Respectfully, yours, A. G. SCHWAB & BRO.

DEAR SIR: A few days since I had the pleasure of reading your speech on the watch situation, and having been engaged in the business for over thirty-five years I was very much interested.

I wish to add our experience as jobbers, which may help to throw light on the situation. In the first place we certainly know of no trust in the business; the competition has always been strong during all the thirty-five years of my connection with the trade, with a general tendency of lowering in price. As far as our experience goes, never has there been any attempt to control us in any way as to what we should buy or where we should buy, our choice in these matters being entirely dictated by our knowledge of the quality of the goods and the market demand at the prices given.

Hoping that these few words may be of use to you in getting at the truth, we remain,

WATCH MANUFACTURERS,
OFFICIAL STANDARD WATCHES FOR RAILROAD SERVICE,
Cleveland, Ohio, June 11, 1906.

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have noticed from time to time articles appearing in the papers concerning the "watch trust," which it is alleged by some Representatives in the House at Washington to be in operation, as they claim, detrimental to the interests of the American watch-buying public.

We have been interested in the American watch industry for more than thirty years. Our business has been retailing, wholesaling, and manufacturing, and we believe that our experience in these several capacities would bring us in contact with any trust or combination that would be detrimental to our interests in some one of the three departments; but up to this time we beg to state that no manufacturer, wholesaler, or retailer, has ever approached us with any trust propositions of any kind whatever.

We have been entirely free to buy from all the different manufacturers, and we do not believe there is any trust or combination at the present time which is in any way harmful to the interests of the American watch industry, either on a retail, wholesale, or manufacturing basis.

This agitation, we believe, is being brought forward and urged on by interests which are not able to meet the competition on quality and finish of the manufacturers who have shown more progress and skill in keeping abreast of the times.

If these interests would spend their time, talent, and money in improving their product, the results of such effort would be decidedly to their credit and to the helpful advantage of the American watch industry.

Merit and integrity will win success in spite of trusts and combinations. The American watch buying public are ever willing to recognize merit and pay a reasonable price for reliable and durable watches. They want value received.

We hope yourself and associates will be able to meet this unjust agitation against American watch manufacturers on a basis that will be fair to the several interests involved.

Very respectfully,

THE WEBB C. BALL WATCH CO.

HONORABLE SIR: We wish to compliment you on the stand you have taken in presenting the position of the American watch companies, in your address before the House of Representatives, in Washington.

We wish to uphold you in the stand you have taken. We, as wholesalers of American watches, find there is much competition in the watch business, and that it is the result of competition, which places us in the position we are, selling high-grade American watches at the low price they are being offered at, at this time, to our customers.

We wish to state that we do not know if there is any trust or combination in the watch business. We are not restricted or interfered with, handling such makes or manufactures of watches as we may be disposed to purchase.

We are not restricted from handling such manufactures and makes of watches as we may find it to our business interests to deal in.

We believe that the present competition in watches has placed the consumer in a position to buy a better American watch to-day for less money than at any period since watches have been made in this country.

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: As jobbers of American watches, we have noted with interest the difference of opinion expressed at Washington pertaining to the watch industry, and also your own position in the matter.

We are dispensers of the product of several of the larger American houses who manufacture watch movements and cases, and therefore we are naturally interested in all that has been said and printed regarding the subject. We have been recently asked, by letter, several pointed questions bearing on the subject, to which we have already replied. In this reply we briefly stated our independence as a jobbing institution, purchasing in the open market with a natural freedom where we can to the very best advantage.

The American watch market presents a broad, comprehensive, and desirable line for selection, a condition not possible except where the keenest competition and independence of action on the part of the individual manufacturer exists. The natural result of this strong competition has caused steady decline in the prices to the consumer, at the same time creating a better product and more reliable timepiece. Please pardon the intrusion of these expressions on your valuable time.

With the hope that the present discussion before the House on this matter will be brought to a satisfactory conclusion for the benefit of the watch industry and the general trade, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

AVERY & BROWN,

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: The agitation and speeches in Congress regarding the alleged trust in American watches have been of interest to us, and having carefully read the facts, pro and con, as presented, and having been entirely free from any domination or direction in the exercise of our business transactions, we feel justified in taking the liberty of addressing you, both in fairness to ourselves, as well as to the manufacturers, who seem to have been grossly misrepresented.

Both members of this firm have been engaged in the American watch business for nearly thirty years; the last eleven years we have passed together under the above firm name as jobbers in American watches, buying from watch factories and selling to retail jewelers throughout the United States; and as our active business has been of considerable volume we believe that our experiences and views are entitled to be considered in this connection. In all that period we individually or jointly have positively never known of any watch trust. Spiteful references about alleged watch trusts have frequently been circulated for about twenty-five years and mostly dwelt upon by those least calculated in business relations to know what they talked about, and mostly stimulated by parties who have some object to gain in business competition by seeking to poison the minds of jewelers and the public at large, by circulating false and misleading information, hoping thereby to gain some sentimental or commercial advantage against competitors, based upon well known prejudices against the idea of trusts. We have been free to buy movements and cases of all makes as we chose and of whom we pleased, and our numerous customers have never given us any intimation that they felt the influences of so-called "trust methods."

The prominence recently given this general subject has resulted in a more general discussion at large than we have ever heard of before, and those who are directly interested, standing as we do as jobbers between the manufacturers and the retail jewelers, should surely be the first ones to have a grievance against trust methods if there were any; but being entirely free from any such feelings and not knowing of any other jobbers who have, we can unqualifiedly state that our business is entirely free from any such molestation. In fact, on the contrary, we sometimes wish there had been some influences of this nature to have made the business of jobbing watches generally more satisfactory and profitable than is promoted by free and open competition such as now exists.

Yours, respectfully,

AVERY & BROWN.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL.

HONORED SIR: As jobbers in American watches, we wish to express our extreme appreciation of your masterful speech, which you delivered in the House of Representatives on April 26, in answer to the remarks made by the Hon. Mr. Rainey against the Elgin and Waltham watch companies.

We have been buying from these two watch companies for a quarter of a century, and at no time had we reason to regard them as a trust in any sense that this term may imply. Never during the course of our dealing with them have we been dictated by them as to the manner of transacting our business. We have always been at perfect liberty to buy our watches from whomever we considered profitable.

The methods of the Elgin and Waltham companies, as far as our dealings with them entitled us to judge, have always been strictly in keeping with the most honorable, broad-minded principles of any honorable trade, and we don't exaggerate when we say that it is due to these excellent methods of the companies that both the jobbers and the retailers have been able to successfully compete against the enormous importation of Swiss watches to this country.

In conclusion we wish to compliment you upon your splendid arraignment of the gentleman from lower Broadway, and only wish it could be sent broadcast throughout the country.

Asking your pardon for transgressing upon your valuable time, we remain,

Yours, truly,

Cincinnati, June 11, 1906.

Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: Referring to Mr. RAINEY'S speech in Congress and your answer to same, would state that we are jobbers of watches, and have no knowledge whatever of the existence of any watch trust in this country.

We find that the competition among manufacturers is keener than ever, and reductions in prices of both movements and cases have taken place periodically, and we think they are now lower than at any time during our twenty-nine years' business experience.

In the handling of these goods we are guided altogether by their quality and popularity, as well as the price of the same. It is only natural that we should prefer makes of well-known standard qualities to those of obscure makes and unknown qualities, enabling us, as it does, to transact a larger volume of business.

Yours, truly, A. & J. PLAUT.

DEAR SIR: Having read Mr. RAINEY'S speech in regard to the watch situation, and having also been very much interested by what has been said by yourself and others, we wish to state as jobbers of American watches that, so far as we know, there is not in existence a watch trust. There is a competition in prices among the various manufacturers, and there are no rules in existence restricting the purchase of the various manufacturers.

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: Having read the speech made by Mr. RAINEY, and having handled all kinds of American watches as wholesale dealers for over forty years, we have never heard of the existence of a watch trust, and it is not possible that such a trust could exist without our knowing it. We are at liberty to buy watches where we please.

DEAR SIR: We have read your recent speech on the watch question. In regard to the efforts of Congressman RAINEY to show that there is a watch trust in this country, we take the liberty of saying that we do not know of any trust in existence now or in the past. We have been jobbers of American watches for a number of years, and we have always bought from manufacturers from whom we could buy to the best advantage.

MY DEAR SIR: Your speech, in answer to Mr. Rainey with regard to the watch situation, has been read by me with considerable interest. With regard thereto, permit me to say that I am very much interested in both sides of the proposition, but that Mr. Rainey has submitted many supposedly facts of which in my twenty odd years' experience I have had no knowledge, notwithstanding the fact that I consider watches my stronghold, and particularly those of American manufacture in which I see it to my advantage in profit to handle. At the present time there is no watch trust in existence, so far as I am aware, and I believe that I am in a position to know the situation quite well.

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: I have read your speech in Congress answering Mr. Rainey on the watch question. Mr. Rainey, as I understand it, is trying to demonstrate there is a watch trust in America, whereas such is not a fact. To this I can assert from experience as a jobber in American watches for a great many years. I, for one, run my business to suit myself, and am not interfered with. If there were a trust I surely would know it.

DEAR SIR: We have received and read with interest your recent speech on the watch tariff.

We notice Mr. Rainey's attempt to show that there is a watch trust in this country. Our business career, as wholesale dealers in all kinds of American watches, covers a period of twenty-five years. We are prepared to say that there has never been any watch trust nor is there one now, nor could there be one without our knowledge. We deal in such goods as we choose without advice of or consultation with anyone outside of this firm.

DEAR SIR: We take the liberty of thanking you for the views which you expressed in your recent speech concerning the watch business. Mr. Rainey is positively mistaken in making any claims that there is a watch trust existing in this country. We have been in the watch business for the past twenty years selling all kinds of watches at wholesale, and we are in a position to know and state emphatically that we are not aware of any watch trust whatsoever.

Thanking you again for the position you have taken in this matter in putting the truth before the public, we remain,

Yours, respectfully,

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with great pleasure a speech which you delivered in Congress on Thursday, April 26, in answer to an address delivered by Congressman Rainey.

It certainly impressed me with the real knowledge that you have gained regarding the watch industry of this country. You are also justified in absolutely denying the accusation against the Elgin and Waltham watch companies being a trust, or parties to a trust. I have been in the wholesale watch business here for the past twenty-two years and have sold various makes of American made watches. I do not know of any trust in this industry ever existing during that time or now. I am certainly in a position to know if a trust in the watch business were in existence.

With highest regards and esteem, I am,

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: We have noted in the newspapers your speech referring to a so-called "watch trust," and as jobbers of American watches we feel very much interested.

From our experience with the various watch manufacturers we are not aware of the existence of any such trust, as no restriction has been placed upon us by any American watch manufacturer. We guide our purchases only by the best the market produces, considering only quality and price.

SIR: Being interested in the jewelry and watch business, we have read your speech of April 26, 1906, delivered to House of Representatives, and we, from our experience of thirty years, fail to see where certain watch producers are a "trust" simply because they have created a demand for their product over their less-fortunate competitors. We have every reason to believe and know that there is no trust or combination formed for the purpose of controlling watches in the United States, we confining our purchases as regulated by beauty of design and quality of workmanship.

DEAR SIR: For many years we have been jobbers of Elgin and Waltham watch movements, and, truthfully speaking, we were the ones that solicited the privilege of jobbing the watch movements manufactured by them. THE SCRIBNER & LOEHR COMPANY,
WHOLESALE AND MANUFACTURING JEWELERS,

Hon. H. S. BOUTELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As jobbers of watches we are naturally interested in all topics or literature relating to that line of our business, and your speech of April 22, 1906, has come to our notice. We wish to heartily approve of the stand which you have taken in relation to the sale of watches in this country and the able manner in which you have defended our two great American factories. We have been handling both the Elgin and Waltham watches, together with similar goods made in other factories, and we wish to say that the sale of the Elgin and Waltham watches exceeds that of all the other watches combined by a great percentage. In fact, it seems these watches almost sell themselves, and we have no difficulty in placing them on the market.

It gives us great pleasure to read your remarks about the New York fakir who advertises to do things and then fails to do them. In the course of our business we have had a great many amusing incidents on just such questions. We have been approached by small dealers whose minds have been poisoned by nefarious advertising and by jobbers who tell the small dealers not to buy goods from the Elgin and Waltham people, as they are in a watch trust. This statement is made recklessly, and there is no effort made to prove the same, and it is very annoying to us to be obliged to correct this report and convince the various dealers that there is no such thing as a watch trust, at least so far as the Elgin and Waltham companies are concerned. We find that they are very great competitors, and are in no way connected, as far as we can learn, in any such a thing as a watch trust. In fact, both of these companies are making every effort honestly and in strict competition to sell goods, one against the other. The advertising that is done in the daily newspapers of our big cities is ample proof what these companies are trying to do to sell honest American goods at honest and reasonable prices. After reading many of the remarks made by the various gentlemen during the course of your speech, we have come to the conclusion that the more light there is thrown on this matter the better it will be for all concerned. We think that you have handled the case in a very able manner, and that some of your opponents were greatly misinformed. We should like very much to have an airing given to the methods of some of the "pirates" in the watch trade, and we think the atmosphere would be much clearer therefor, and would enable all jobbers who wish to do business in an honest and legitimate way to sell the best American products at a reasonable profit. If you will take the trouble to investigate you will find that the jobber makes a minimum of profit only.

We wish to thank you on behalf of the watch dealers in our vicinity for the effort you have made in our behalf.

Yours, respectfully,

THE SCRIBNER & LOEHR CO.,

The Hon. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

DEAR SIR: In reading your speech, as well as others, recently delivered in the House of Representatives, we were particularly impressed at what efforts were being made to create the impression that a trust or combination exists between the watch manufacturers of the United States.

With a view of giving information, and to avoid a serious mistake being made, we wish to emphatically state that in our experience in the watch industry, covering over twenty-five years, we know positively that a watch trust or combination does not exist between the watch manufacturers of this country, and that there is a decided competition in the marketing of all makes of cases and movements manufactured in this country.

If we can assist in giving you any further information on this subject we shall be pleased to do so.

Letter from Hon. W. B. Brinton, of Dixon, Ill., to Hon. J. G. Cannon, calling attention to the absurdity of the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Rainey.

GRAND DETOUR PLOW COMPANY,
Dixon, Ill., May 10, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CANNON: I have received a copy of the speech made by Mr. RAINEY on the tariff question. He states that plows and agricultural implements are sold abroad from 25 per cent to 50 per cent cheaper than the American farmer who lives within 50 miles of the different factories can buy them.

As a manufacturer of such implements for many years, I wish to state that I will thank you to obtain from Mr. RAINEY the evidence to make good this statement unless he should find some isolated case where some bankrupt goods were sold. There is not 25 per cent profit, much less 50 per cent profit, in goods sold by the manufacturer to the dealer 40 miles from our factory.

Thus you will observe that Mr. RAINEY'S statement is simply ridiculous, and does the implement manufacturers a great injustice in that it makes our customers in this country feel as if they were being robbed by the manufacturer of agricultural implements.

A friend of mine in the manufacturing business in Kentucky states that he has written Mr. RAINEY and also Mr. WILLIAMS, and has heard nothing from them in reply to his letters; hence the writer takes the liberty of writing you as above, feeling that he is privileged to do this owing to the fact that it has been his pleasure to know you personally all his life.

Wishing you well, and thanking you for such of your time as it may be necessary to take to dig into this—for we are entitled to the facts—I am,

Yours, very truly, W. B. BRINTON.

Editorial from Brooklyn Eagle showing the injurious effect upon the watch industry in Great Britain of the "fetich of free trade."

WATCH MAKING.

The fact that the United States has forged ahead of Great Britain in the manufacture of watches is made the subject of an article in the Magazine of Commerce, by T. P. Hewitt, the managing director of a Lancashire watch company. Mr. Hewitt asserts that the watch trade of Great Britain is being gradually transferred to the United States.

"Forty years ago," he says, "the best-known devices in the modern watch were invented by English makers, and at that time only 50,000 watches were made in the United States and 164,000 in Great Britain. But in the course of these forty years the whole situation has been reversed, and while in Great Britain only 226,000 watches were made in the year 1902, in the United States the enormous number of 2,750,000 were turned out. Against the very nearly 3,000,000 watches made in this country somewhere about 6,000,000 are made on the continent of Europe, but these do not seem to compete with the American watch. The American watch is rapidly superseding the Swiss and English watches."

Mr. Hewitt attributes the decay of the watch-making industry to what he calls the "obsolescent assay laws" of Great Britain and the strict enforcement of them, and also to what he calls the "fetich of free trade," which has hindered Parliament in its legislation. Birmingham is the great center of the watch industry in England, and that is referred to in connection with the reelection of Mr. Chamberlain on a protection platform.

Extract from "Model Factories and Villages; Ideal Conditions of Laborer and Housing." By Budgett Meakin, lecturer on industrial betterment, etc. London, 1905.

One of the most beautifully situated examples of modern factories is afforded by the Waltham Watch Works, near Boston, Mass., the handsome buildings of which, surrounded by well-kept lawns, overlook on the one side the river and on the other a park-like village, inhabited by the employees, one-fourth of the married among whom own their own homes. The treasurer has expressed the opinion "that all the investments of the company which tend to make the environment of the worker pleasant—the parks, the lawns, and the gardens near the factory—pay in many ways. Their chief value is in their moral influence upon the work people."

Articles from Daily Consular Reports, May 18 and May 24, 1906, showing that the cheaper American watches are winning their way in England against the higher priced British and continental watches.

WATCHES IN BRITAIN—DECLINE IN ENGLISH PRODUCTION—INCREASED IMPORTS.

Consul-General Wynne sends a cutting from the London Daily Telegraph concerning the decline in the manufacture of watches in Great Britain. The article, in part, is as follows:

Among English industries which have suffered severely from foreign competition that of watch making occupies a prominent place. The cheap trade, of which Clerkenwell used to be the flourishing headquarters, has practically gone. It has been captured outright by the enterprising foreigner, and though Clerkenwell road and its purlieus are still the great market center for everything connected with clocks and watches, scarcely a single watch factory survives there. We give some remarkable figures bearing on the influx of foreign watches:

Official returns showing the number of watches made at home and abroad in the last four decades.

Year.	Continental.	American.	English.
1862	2,500,000	50,000	164,000
1872	3,000,000	400,000	145,000
1882	3,500,000	1,250,000	227,000
1892	4,500,000	2,250,000	204,000
1902	6,000,000	2,750,000	226,000

In 1904 more than a million and a half watches were imported into the United Kingdom from foreign countries, representing the sum of £838,000. This means an average of more than 10 shillings for each watch, and considering the flood of common watches of foreign origin that can be bought for much less than that sum, it is evident that a large proportion of those imported can not be classed as inferior goods. Switzerland led with 1,100,000 watches; Germany was the next, with 213,000; France was third, with 80,000; and America fourth, with 64,000. Besides this, almost as many clocks as watches entered our ports, Germany in this instance leading the way with a million, and the United States being second with a quarter of a million. The effect of the better American watch on the English market has been to make people disinclined to pay more than $20 or $30 for a watch for everyday use.

THE ENGLISH WATCH TRADE.

Consul Hamm, of Hull, England, gives below some interesting facts concerning the growth of the watch trade. He quotes figures published showing the comparative increase in the industry on the Continent of Europe, in America, and in England. They are as follows:

Year.	Continental.	American.	English.
1862	2,500,000	50,000	164,000
1872	3,000,000	400,000	145,000
1882	3,500,000	1,250,000	227,000
1892	4,500,000	2,250,000	204,000
1902	6,000,000	2,750,000	226,000

From this table it appears that there has been a great difference in the comparative increase in the watch trade on the Continent during forty years past, in America, and in England. English manufacturers are complaining that the trade is being taken away from them by the competition they have to meet on account of free trade. About 3,000,000 watches made abroad are imported into England annually.

The question of selling abroad more cheaply than at home assumes different aspects when regarded from different standpoints. It makes all the difference in the world whether a country is the one that dumps or the one that is dumped upon; whether it is the "dumper" or the "dumpee." England was the great original "dumper." She is now realizing what it is to be the "dumpee." To the great credit of American manufacturers, not only of watches, but of numerous other articles, we are beating England both in her home markets and in the Orient.

Much of our dumping is to secure the market for American goods. When they have been tried and their superiority demonstrated, the market will be under our control, and prices can be raised. One of the best instances of selling abroad more cheaply than at home for the purpose of securing the market is in the cotton-goods industry, where our manufacturers are striving for the markets of the Orient against the manufacturers of England, Germany, and Japan.

The following article by an English economist of high rank is interesting from the point of view of the "dumpee:"

[From article by Sir Robert Giffen on "Imports and home productions," in the Economic Journal, vol. 15, December, 1905, pp. 489–490.]

Then, there are the various cases of dumping. Our industries, it is alleged, are not merely exposed to the free competition of normal foreign industries, but they have to contend with fitful and spasmodic interferences when foreigners "dump" a surplus on our markets and upset the ordinary conditions of business. To cultivate a market or to prevent some other market being swamped of which he happens to possess a monopoly or to get rid of bankrupt stocks at slaughter prices the foreigner sends goods at prices which are ruinous to the home producer of like articles. There is consequent injury of a grave kind to some producers at home without corresponding gain to the rest of the community. But apart from the exaggeration incidental to all such statements, can it be said that such "dumping" from abroad is in any way different from ordinary incidents in all home competition? Liquidation sales or clearing sales at prices much below normal or average are the ordinary features of shopkeeping, as anyone may see who walks along Regent street, or Oxford street, or Piccadilly, or the streets of any great city. So also are sales below cost price in order to make a market, or sales of leading articles, like sugar, by grocers, who count on making their profit on sales of tea to the customers whom cheap sugar attracts. A more recent illustration of leading articles in business has perhaps been given by the Times in its offer of the advantages of a book club as a means of inducing intending members to become subscribers to the Times. "Dumping" is no other than an artifice of competition, and it is hardly a special evil to be dealt with in a question of the policy of restricting imports. It belongs rather to the category of what the State may be called on to do for the protection of individual interests when they are threatened by exceptional mischiefs of a specially grave character, such as earthquakes, or inundations, or fires on a large scale. The question of a policy of restricting imports and that of free trade is hardly to be determined by passionate arguments and prejudices excited by "dumping."

As the wages of labor in the watch industry have been doubled since the establishment of this business and its development under the beneficent influences of the Republican protective tariff policy, the following table showing the trend of prices in the watches of the Elgin Company is interesting and suggestive. While wages in this business have doubled, the average price of watches has gone down to about one-fourth.

Article from the Chicago Tribune of May 31, 1906, recounting the good work that has been done in Illinois in enforcing the laws against child labor.

CHILD LABOR IS REDUCED—INSPECTOR'S REPORT SHOWS DECREASE OF 80 PER CENT—EDGAR T. DAVIES SUBMITS TABLES SHOWING THE RESULTS ACCOMPLISHED BY HIS WORK—GOVERNOR DENEEN GETS INFORMATION REGARDING THE WORK OF THE DEPARTMENT—MANY VIOLATORS ARE PROSECUTED, THE MAJORITY BEING IN CHICAGO—FINES ARE COLLECTED.

There is proportionately one-fifth as many children now employed in Illinois as there was twelve years ago, owing to efficacious child-labor legislation and the enforcement of the law by the State department of factory inspection. This is one of the results shown in the annual report of Chief Inspector Edgar T. Davies, which he forwarded yesterday to Governor Deneen.

The report shows the steady decrease of child labor in the State during that time. Especially marked has been the decrease since the enactment of the new child-labor law in 1903. In 1893 there was one child employed for every eleven adults. In 1902, the year before the new law went into effect, this ratio had been decreased to one child to every twenty-five adults. The operation of the new law, as enforced by the department, has resulted in thinning the number of child laborers to one for every sixty-five adults.

The percentage of children employed in 1905 was 1.5, as compared with 1.9 in 1904, and 3.7 in 1902. Constant progress in the diminution of child labor is shown by this table:

Year.	Adults for each child employed.	Percentage of child labor.
1905	64.44	1.5
1904	62.01	1.9
1903	33.06	2.9
1902	25.06	3.7
1901	23.04	4.1
1900	22.17	3.3
1899	29.27	3.3
1898	28.47	3.3
1897	28.19	3.4
1896	26.27	3.7
1895	20.95	4.6
1894	13.76	6.2
1893	10.80	8.2

The department secured 1,001 convictions in Illinois in prosecutions for violations of the factory laws. Of this number 799 were in Chicago and 202 in the State at large. With the exceptions of 7 cases, all the convictions were for violation of the child-labor laws. Summarized, the convictions were as follows:

	Chicago.	Outside Chicago.
Employing children under 14	24	11
Employing children without age certificates	358	127
Employing children more than eight hours a day	388	62
Employing children in dangerous work	3	----------
Employing children at night	19	2
Failure to protect polishing wheels	1	----------
Employing persons outside family in home	4	----------
Obstructing deputy	2	----------
Fines and costs collected	$6,827.70	$1,680.50

MANY INSPECTIONS ARE MADE.

For the year the department reports 71,358 inspections, of which 65,797 were to enforce the child-labor law, 229 for enforcing safety appliances in the operation of metal-polishing wheels, and 5,332 were additional inspections, in which the law was found to be habitually ignored. This work represents 20,536 more inspections than were made in 1904, and 49,017 more than made by the department in 1901.

The chief inspector reports 769,352 persons employed in the State, of which 592,559 were men, 165,038 women, 7,127 boys, and 4,628 girls. In Chicago the number of persons employed was 540,018, as follows: 399,346 men, 131,230 women, 5,347 boys, and 4,095 girls. The total number of children under 16 employed in the State was 11,755, as compared with 12,411 in 1904.

Mr. Davies describes in detail the operation of the new child-labor law and of the bureau for the issuance of age and school certificates. He suggests several changes which he believes will result in eliminating fraud in obtaining the certificates.

APPENDIX—PART II.

PRESENT PROSPEROUS CONDITIONS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY; THE REASONS THEREFOR; AND DEMOCRATIC OPINIONS FORTELLING A DIFFERENT STORY.

Opinions of Democratic leaders as late as 1900 on the free-silver delusion, from debates in House of Representatives on Gold Standard and Banking Bill of March 14, 1900.

[December 8, 1899. Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. Page 160.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee:

"For the first time in our history, Mr. Speaker, a proposition is presented to us here to fasten upon this country by statutory enactment the single gold standard. That is something new in this country."

[December 11. Fifty-sixth Congress, first session. Page 208.]

Mr. MADDOX of Georgia, in charge of opposition:

"This bill in my judgment is a scheme by which, I think, will be operated the most gigantic trust that ever cursed any nation or country. * * *

"I want to say now that this bill as proposed has been considered in financial circles but has not been asked for by the great body of the people of this country.

"Let every Democrat vote no, thereby putting the seal of his condemnation on the most dangerous and baneful measure that has found its way into Congress in a half century."

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky (December 13, 1899. Page 304):

"I am opposed to the principle and every section of the bill. I stand by the declaration of my party and declare nothing short of the free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver at the ratio of 16 of silver to 1 of gold will ever settle this question."

Mr. COWHERD of Missouri (December 13. Page 329):

"Believing, as I said, that it is more dangerous to the commercial and business interests of the United States than the wildest scheme of finance ever devised or seriously offered to the American people, I shall surely vote against the measure."

Mr. KLEBERG of Texas (December 13. Page 350):

"In the name of the common people, in the name of Democracy, I protest! Gentlemen of the majority you may pass this bill, but the American people are apt to reverse your judgment in 1900 by the election of W. J. Bryan and a Congress which will stand by the Chicago platform. You are sowing the wind, you will reap the whirlwind."

Mr. COONEY of Missouri (December 13. Page 357): "I congratulate the people of the United States on the heroic struggle they have made for financial freedom, and that this is the last of all the great nations to succumb to the corruption and injustice by which the gold standard has been everywhere enacted into law."

Mr. HENRY of Texas (December 13): "I can not permit this bill to pass without recording my unequivocal protest against it. * * * This bil is the first step, and the funding project wil come next. Then the toiling millions, the brawn and muscle of the honest yeomanry will be chained for years to come as financial serfs to the money oligarchy of the nation."

Mr. LANHAM of Texas (December 14. Page 384): "Oh, what a radical, cruel, and far-reaching inconoclasm is about to be perpetrated, and with what indecent haste is the rush to its accomplishment!"

Mr. BURKE of Texas (December 14. Page 394):

"I may be mistaken, sir, but I believe a large majority of the people of this country are opposed to the financial system sought to be established by this bill."

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky (December 14. Page 402):

"Banks of deposit and discount are a benefaction, but those of issue are a curse to any citizenship.

"For these reasons the national-bank features of this bill are seriously objectionable, and in the name of the splendid constituency I represent I not only protest against this extension of the Government favors to these institutions but appeal for a withdrawal of those they now enjoy."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (December 15. Page 466):

"Mr. Chairman, answering for myself, I stand here to say that I have never yet made a public utterance by which I would not abide, because the utterance has always been not only the conviction of my constituens, but my own. [Applause on Democratic side.] And had I the power now, standing here as I do, if I were the Czar of America and had unlimited power, I would to-morrow open the mints to the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, with but one doubt in my mind, and that doubt would be as to whether it were not better to go to the world's legislative ratio of 15½ to 1."

Mr. BAILEY of Texas (December 15. Page 483):

"Mr. DALZELL: The gentleman still thinks that silver ought to be coined at the mints at the ratio of 16 to 1?

"Mr. BAILEY of Texas: I do. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]"

Extracts from debates in the Senate and House of Representatives on the passage of the Dingley tariff of 1897, giving opinions of prominent Democrats on—

I.

The conditions that prevailed in the country under the last Democratic Administration.

MISSOURI.

Mr. VEST (May 25, 1897): Mr. President, there is no disposition on my part or that of my colleagues to make facetious opposition to the passage of the pending measure. We fully appreciate the desperate condition of the country. We know how many ruined homes, how many broken hearts, how many blasted hopes now surround the Congress of the United States, and if prosperity can come from any source, even from our political opponents, we shall welcome it, and not only welcome it, but bless the moment in which it comes. * * * But, Mr. President, I am more interested, I must confess, and naturally, in the effect of such legislation upon the people whom I immediately represent. My State is a large agricultural State; one of the largest in the Union. In my life, now verging upon three score years and ten, I have never seen in that land of plenty such ruin and depression as exists to-day. * * * I think that I state the feelings of everyone upon this side of the Chamber when I say that if our friends can bring relief, if they can shed light upon our darkened path, I shall hail that light with joy, no matter in whose hands the lamp may be. * * * Give prosperity to the country, relieve the people, and for myself I shall give the meed of praise where it belongs, and shall gladly accept the result, no matter from what source it comes.

VIRGINIA.

Mr. SWANSON (March 23, 1897): Each of these recurring years has brought times harder than the preceding; each brought greater business depression, greater fall in prices, greater poverty. Increasing debt and distress have come along with increased industry and frugality. The people's woes have grown despite the largest agricultural crops ever produced. * * * In less than four years, in time of profound peace, with bountiful crops and harvests, two extraordinary sessions of Congress have been called to furnish measures of relief to a suffering people.

TENNESSEE.

Mr. BATE (July 6, 1897): There comes on the wind from every section of the country the wail of an impoverished people.

Mr. MCMILLIN (March 24, 1897): Ruin is abroad in the land, and it is not confined to any particular vocation. The bank doors are closing and bank presidents are going to Canada and the penitentiary. * * * Out in the West the bins and reservoirs of industry are bursting with the wheat and corn for which there is no market.

KENTUCKY.

Mr. SMITH (March 31, 1897): Stagnation and depression rule with despotic sway in every department of business life. Able, enterprising, and cautious men have been swept into the vortex of hopeless and irretrievable insolvency. Want and penury are visible in the faces of countless thousands who wander up and down the streets of the great metropolitan cities in search of employment that can not be had at any price, and in numberless homes erstwhile radiant with the glow of success and contentment there is now the somber hues of discontentment and destitution.

II.

That only free silver could bring prosperity.

VIRGINIA.

Mr. SWANSON (March 23, 1897): The Wilson bill has been a benefit and not a detriment. The curse of the country has been the gold standard, and not reduced tariff taxes.

TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY (May 3, 1897): If you demonstrate, as demonstrate you will, that a high tariff under a gold standard will not bring prosperity, I will stake my political fortune on the proposition that the American people will then vote to restore bimetallism as the only means of restoring prosperity to this country.

ARKANSAS.

Mr. DINSMORE (March 30, 1897): There will never be international agreement, but there will be bimetallism in this country; there will be free, unlimited, and independent coinage of silver, and then there will be prosperity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

GEORGIA.

Mr. TATE (March 24, 1897): Sir, the people of this country will not have prosperity until we restore the money of our fathers.

III.

Prophesying what the effects of passage of the Dingley bill would be.

TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY (March 19, 1897): You promised to make the times better for all the people, and you must redeem that promise or be driven from the high places which you occupy. * * * Four years of the taxation proposed in this bill will prove a severe drain upon the energies of our people and the resources of our country, but if they demonstrate, as I believe they will, the vicious error of the protective system, the lesson, though costly, will be worth its price. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

(April 10, 1897.) If you succeed, the Democratic party might as well not make a nomination in the next Presidential election. If you fail, you might as well not make a nomination in the next Presidential election. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, let us give the country a chance to decide who is right and who is wrong. You have applied your remedy. I am confident it will fail. I am so confident of its failure that I want to raise no other issue. I want the country to decide between your wisdom and ours upon the measures which you have already proposed. Let the country see whether it is tariff revision or financial reform which shall work out our redemption. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MISSOURI.

Mr. CLARK (March 30, 1897): We may be "fools" and "leatherheads" and all that sort of thing, but I tell you, gentlemen, the people living west of the Allegheny Mountains and south of the Potomac have sense enough to know when they are sandbagged and held up.

Mr. BLAND (March 31, 1897): Mr. Chairman, the effect of this bill known as the Dingley bill will be to largely increase the taxes of the people. It will tend to shut out importations, and in that mode the bill will necessarily interfere with the exportation of agricultural products from this country.

Mr. DOCKERY (July 19, 1897): The highways of ocean commerce and the markets of the world are to be again surrendered to England and other nations and the business enterprise of our own people limited to our own shores. * * * It was Waterloo for the Republican party in 1890 and 1892. It will be Waterloo, Sedan, and Pultowa, all in one, in 1897 and 1898.

Mr. DE ARMOND (July 24, 1897): We will meet you at every cross road; we will defy you upon every stump; we will strip bare your skeletons; we will show that your tariff bill just passed, about which you boast so much—the bill that is to herald in prosperity for the few and adversity for the many—is the most iniquitous, the most villainous, the most oppressive tariff bill ever made.

TEXAS.

Mr. BALL (July 19, 1897): Why, sir, this bill is a declaration of commercial war upon the nations of the earth. It will not open a single market for anything we make or produce; it will close many to various industries; it will not add a customer to our mills or factories from abroad, and domestic consumption can not be increased by raising the cost of our own wares to a people without money to buy their present output at existing prices. * * * The days of the Republican party will be "few and full of trouble," and the wrath of an outraged people, which reached high-water mark in 1892, will come again and cover them in 1900, as the molten lava from Vesuvius did the ancient cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LANHAM (July 19, 1897): Pass your bill, reeking as it does with blight and burden, carrying as it does disaster and distress, freighted as it is with woe and waste, filled as it is with injustice and oppression to your fellowmen; but it will but briefly blot and blur the statute books of this mighty nation, for it is against the genius of our institutions, the ethics of civilization, the properties of life, the equities of good government, and the conscience of a free people that Mammon shall be enthroned and that money shall rule in this land, consecrated to liberty and to justice. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MISSOURI.

Mr. DE ARMOND (March 25, 1897): You may give some prosperity—I do not know whether you will or not—you may give some prosperity to favored spots in New England, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, to that favored region which lies east of the Alleghenies and north of the Potomac. You may do it; I do not know. But you will only do that temporarily if at all. Yours will be but a fitful gleam of prosperity, until something is done which will bring relief to the West and to the South; until something is done which will bring prosperity to the country in general without wrong to any class, without hardship upon any, without partially toward any. Your measure will not do that.

TEXAS.

Mr. SAYERS (March 24, 1897): The bill before us not only imposes burdens to the extent named, but reaches every section of the country and lays its heavy hand upon every man, woman, and child in the United States.

HAS THE DINGLEY TARIFF BROUGHT "BLIGHT AND BURDEN," AS PROPHESIED BY GOVERNOR LANHAM, OF TEXAS, TO THOSE PARTS OF THE COUNTRY WHICH MR. CLARK SAID WOULD BE "SANDBAGGED" BY A REPUBLICAN TARIFF? READ THE FOLLOWING:

History of industrial conditions in Texas traced in the biennial messages of her governors from 1895 to 1905.

Message of Gov. C. A. Culberson to Texas legislature, January 16, 1895.

The net decrease of $20,000,000 for 1894 in the total taxable values will, if maintained the present year, reduce the revenue $30,000 per annum at the present tax rate. This condition of affairs affects the credit of the State, embarrasses State institutions, and creates widespread hardship and injustice.

As illustrating this the State is the owner by purchase of university bonds amounting to $576,540, the interest upon which is used for the support of that great institution, the maintenance of which at its present high standard should touch keenly the pride of every Texan. There has been default in the payment of the current interest of these bonds, which is embraced in the registered warrants named, and unless speedily remedied the university will be seriously crippled. And every character of State warrant, whether for salaries, supplies, or on other accounts, is now subject to discount. The total deficiency, including the public schools and the general fund, is $1,455,349.89. * * * And repeating part of speech made by him on the 29th preceding September: "These taxes, together with the fact that all values are depressed, and that the great body of the people feel the pressure of debt and enforced economy, render a further burden indefensible unless unavoidable."

It is true Texas is growing toward a destiny that passes our vision, and public needs will naturally and inevitably enlarge with this progress, but we are in the midst of industrial stagnation and financial distess which press heavily upon the people. Every citizen is constrained to curtail expenses in his private affairs, and for the legislature to add to the burden by unnecessary expenditure or increase in public charges would be both indefensible and inexcusable.

[Message of Governor Culberson to Texas legislature, January 12, 1899, House Journal, p. 13.]

So gratifying indeed is the general condition of State affairs that it should inspire congratulations and pride in all who are concerned for the public weal.

[House Journal, Twenty-seventh legislature, January 10, 1901, page 18.]

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR, JOSEPH D. SAYERS.

To the senate and house of representatives:

It is indeed gratifying that you have convened under circumstances so auspicious.

Excepting not more than 15 of the 243 counties—organized and unorganized—into which the State is divided, prosperity prevails in them all to an extent not exceeded in any year of their history.

Abundant crops with a remunerative market have well rewarded the husbandman, and never before has the demand for labor—skilled and unskilled—been so great and universal, or the compensation of wage-earners more satisfactory.

The cattle and sheep industries are prosperous; railway construction has been actively renewed, and manufacturing enterprises of many kinds are being inaugurated.

Money has become more plentiful, and its circulation more general, resulting in a marked decline of the interest rate.

A desirable immigration is being attracted in large numbers, through the healthfulness of our climate, the fertility and freshness of our lands, and the many opportunities that here await industry, economy, and thrift.

The resources of the State, in all their variety, wealth, and abundance, are unknown even to ourselves; but with the continuance of present conditions, though for a few years only, and with a prudent and conservative administration of the public affairs, such development may be safely anticipated as will not disappoint the most sanguine expectations.

With the construction of the Isthmian Canal, nothing except inexcusable folly in matters of government will prevent this Commonwealth taking within the next two decades the foremost place among the States of the American Union.

[House Journal, Twenty-eighth Texas legislature, p. 43, 1903.]

MESSAGE FROM GOVERNOR JOSEPH D. SAYERS.

At this juncture Mr. N. A. Cravens, private secretary to the governor, appeared at the bar of the House and, being duly announced, presented the following message from the governor:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Though more severely afflicted than in any like period of its existence, except only during our civil war, the advancement of the State in all directions for the past four years has been without precedent in its history.

[Texas House Journal, January 12, 1905, p. 41.]

MESSAGE FROM GOVERNOR S. W. T. LANHAM.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

To assemble as you do under circumstances so generally favorable is a matter upon which we can all felicitate ourselves. The people, as a rule, have enjoyed good health and great prosperity, while the outlook for continued well-being is truly encouraging. Our resources are abundant and their development gratifying.

[Texas House Journal, January 10, 1905, p. 4.]

Speech of Hon. H. P. Breisford, of Eastland County, nominating Hon. F. W. Seabury, of Starr County, for speaker of the house.

To make the laws of this great Commonwealth is a trust of grave responsibility.

It is well for us to realize that upon the proper discharge of this trust depends to the farthest extent the weal or woe of Texas.

The happiness and prosperity and contentment of nearly four millions of people depend upon the good laws that this legislature enacts, as well as upon the firmness and sound judgment with which it refuses to experiment with ill-considered innovations, and, too eagerly grasping for the new, thereby release its hold upon the old and tried and safe in legislation.

Present conditions do not demand, will not permit, legislative convulsion.

The great cattle industry of northwest and west and southwest Texas sturdily stemming the current of depressed values; the planters and farmers of the black and red and sandy lands whose good sense at last has checkered the wide spread of the cotton fields with truck patches and alfalfa and corn; the great railroad interests of Texas, with a total mileage now greater than any other State; our banks and trust companies, whose vaults are teeming with dollars not borrowed from the North and East, but the savings of a prosperous people; all of these great factors in the prosperity of grand new Texas sends to us a message set to the new music of whirling looms and spindles and ringing hammers and the clanking machinery of new factories, and the message is: "Let us have peace."

A prosperous people is a conservative people, and when Texas struck a balance sheet at the end of the year just gone her people found reason for exultation.

No one who has lived in Texas long enough to become acclimated has doubted the almost illimitable wealth of her resources or has failed to note the steady and resistless trend toward her destiny as queen regent in the imperial sisterhood of States.

[Editorial from the Washington Post, of Sunday, April 8, 1906, giving a wise view of the effects of our present all-pervading national prosperity. It is sane, cheerful, healthy, optimistic.]

THE EFFECTS OF GENERAL PROSPERITY.

During the political campaigns of 1896 and 1900 radical orators dwelt much upon the concentration of wealth in the hands of the few.

It was evident in the bad times succeeding the memorable panic of 1893 that the per capita of currency in circulation was at a minimum and that the purchasing power of money had greatly increased.

In the sense, therefore, that those who owned cash in large amounts were few in number, and that the currency they held possessed increased purchasing power, there was actual concentration of increased values in the hands of the few, and the orators' statements were correct.

Since 1898 the processes which produced the financial conditions of the period from 1892 to 1898 have been steadily reversed, and in the last six years the currency of the world and that of this country has steadily increased in amount. The products of the mines, the fields, and the forests, of the furnaces, the mills, and the factories, the laborer's work, the artisan's skill, the farmer's crops, and the stockman's cattle have all brought greater prices, while the purchasing power of money has steadily fallen. The few rich may have grown richer, but millions of poor men have become independent and thousands of men formerly struggling have become wealthy. Hard times do concentrate values in the hands of the owners of money, but general prosperity destroys that undesirable and dangerous condition

The prosperity since 1898 has made numerous classes of men independent financially—merchants, manufacturers, brokers, planters, farmers, all of them energetic in affairs; readers, thinkers—men who have real, live interests in the country's progress—men who know their rights and are ready to maintain them. Again, the workingmen of the country are fully aware that there is ample demand for labor, at good wages all over the country, and do not feel dependent upon one or a dozen corporations, bankers, or employers for the means to buy their daily bread. Prosperity has lessened the power of the rich and vastly increased the power of the middle and poorer classes. Instead of concentration of wealth, it is now diffusion of wealth, and in the years to come, for decades of the near future, the purchasing power of money will steadily decline and the world will be rid of the danger resulting from the concentration of money in the hands of the few.

General prosperity lessens the power of money. It reduces the influence of the few and increases the independence of the many.

"SOUTH'S COTTON MILLS."

The Manufacturer's Record published a detailed statement recently, giving the name, address, and number of spindles and looms of every cotton mill in the South. The list shows a total of 642 cotton-mill companies or firms, many of the companies owning two or more mills, with an aggregate of 9,470,000 spindles.

Comparing this with the statistics of the past, we have the following statement of the growth of this industry in the South.

Year.	Spindles.	Capital.
1880	667,000	$21,000,000
1890	1,712,000	60,000,000
1900	4,452,000	112,837,000
1905	9,470,000	230,000,000

Since 1900 this industry, as represented by the number of spindles and the capital invested, has more than doubled, and but for the scarcity of labor, which has prevailed for the last year or two, it is quite probable that at least 1,000,000 more spindles would have been added to the total in the South. The Record says that while some new mills are under construction, and old mills are to some extent being charged, we have reached a point where there can be no great increase in cotton-mill building until we have solved the question of how to provide a more abundant supply of labor.

Friday, June 1, "Texas has no time to give to listening to the calamity howler. It is too busy growing and developing."

Effect of cotton manufacturing in the South under a protection tariff.

Charles C. Thach, of Auburn, Ala., president Alabama Polytechnic Institute, at sixteenth annual meeting American Economic Association, at New Orleans, discussing cotton industry, said:

"Thirty years ago the capital invested in all the mills from the Potomac to the Rio Grande would not have aggregated $3,000,000, to-day it approximates $175,000,000; spindles have increased from 667,000 to 7,500,000, and the South now manufactures one-half of all the cotton now consumed in the United States. Larger population, higher wages, increased purchasing power of operatives, a higher standard of life, better school facilities, and a general uplift in the community life are some of the attendant results.

"And great as is the economic value, still greater is the sociological value of this new form of factory-village life. For this mill people is drawn not from foreign immigrants nor from distant States, but it is drawn from the poor native-born white population. Now, for the first time in their history, they are organized into community life and taking their first step toward civilization and enlightenment."

[Denison Daily Herald, February 25, 1904.]

That Bryan refused to vote for Crisp or Mills for Speaker because they were ex-Confederates, Mr. Bryan should not have a friend in any man who wore a uniform of gray. It has often been asserted that Democracy has returned to sanity. If that be true it must cast the Bryan of dead ideals and selfish sordidness into the outer darkness of political oblivion.

[Waco Daily Herald, Sunday, April 29, 1906.]

AN EXPLODED THEORY.

In their platform the Democrats of Kansas "congratulate the Democratic party and the country upon the triumphant vindication of the quantitative theory of finance. This is a great scoop; nobody else knew that such a thing had taken place. We are surprised that these Kansas Democrats did not copyright their information.

Now the truth is the Government went out of the business of trying to create supplies of money for the people; it abandoned the quantitative theory of finance, with the result that a panic is impossible.

The surprising thing is that a body of men supposedly sensible should indulge a statement contradicted by obvious facts. The quantitative theory of finance is so thoroughly discredited that it is never mentioned in other sections of this country.

[Two editorials from Washington Post, Friday, June 22, 1906.]

INTO MISCHIEF AGAIN.

There was an echo of the silver question in the House of Representatives the other day, and it is much to be feared that the Democratic party did not make any capital out of the debate. Somebody said something about "basic money," and held that the silver dollar is that sort of money. So it is, in the letter of the law; but whenever it shall be so in the administration of the Treasury, then and there, for practical purposes, gold will be as effectively demonetized as it would be if it were dropped from the coinage, and its legal-tender quality taken from it.

"Basic money" is coin that was as valuable in the bullion as it is in the coin, and absolutely without taint of fiat. The silver dollar is one-half fiat, and for "basic" purposes the difference between it and the greenback is in degree only. If the Democratic party had learned this self-evident truth thirteen years ago, and acted upon it, it is pretty certain that everything political in this country would be enthusiastically and triumphantly Democratic this blessed moment. Then was the feast set for them by the President they had chosen, but they preferred to prey on the garbage of error, and quaff the bitter cup of defeat—and they hanker for it to this day.

We have of this so-called "basic" stuff some $550,000,000; worth, in the melting pot, about half that amount. Because of the Republican party, it is granted indulgence to masquerade as "basic coin," though everybody knows that when the next financial panic and industrial depression comes it will be employed as an "endless chain" to deplete the Treasury of gold, and force another sale of bonds to avoid the silver basis. The bill that was discussed the other day provided for turning a part of this basic sham into subsidiary coin. It should have been passed, and will be passed some day or other. Every argument in favor of the gold standard is an argument for this bill; every "argument" for 16 to 1 is an "argument" against this bill. Old "quantitative" made its appearance in the discussion, wearing the same disguise it appeared in in 1896.

The quantitative theory is all right, if you confine it to the real "basic;" but our 16-to-1 friends made the fatal mistake of trying to wed a dollar worth 50 cents to a dollar worth 100 cents. The affinity was lacking, and a divorce would have been inevitable had not the people forbidden the bans.

It would be of immense advantage to the Democratic party to turn all the full legal-tender silver in this country into bullion and sell it in the market at the rate of 5,000,000 ounces a month.

It would, at least, keep the Democratic party out of mischief; that is, that sort of mischief they always get into when they talk about "basic money" and the "quantitative theory."

A BIG BLUNDER REPEATED.

Again Mr. Bryan's Commoner is moved to shout in big, black, signboard letters, "The Chicago Platform Still Lives!" Unlike the guns heard at Brussels on the night before Waterloo, this second shouting by Mr. Bryan's organ is not "nearer, clearer, deadlier than before," but if it happens to fall on the ears of those who do not know that the soul of that platform no longer inhabits its body, the result may be a call "to arms! they come!" The Commoner says: "The Washington Post is offended because the Commoner said 'the Chicago platform still lives.' The Post says that 'free coinage at 16 to 1 was the only vital issue' in the Chicago platform." The Post is not "offended" in the usual sense of that word. It is simply disgusted. The cadaver, 16 to 1, the only object suggested to the general public by a mention of that platform, is extremely unfragrant, in spite of Mr. Bryan's embalming of it in 1900 and his successful effort to prevent its burial in 1904. The Commoner tries to magnify other planks in that far-famed declaration of policies, but it is undeniable that the currency issue, 16 to 1 versus the gold standard, was the only issue of the campaign. Conclusive proof of the dominancy of that issue is furnished by the fact that Mr. Cleveland and a million or more of his political brethren, including the extreme antiprotection element of the Democratic party, rallied to the McKinley standard and practically voted for the Dingley tariff as the only means of preventing currency debate. It seems strange—it is, in fact, incomprehensible to us—this blurting out by the Commoner, "The Chicago platform still lives!" simultaneously with the effort in several quarters, more or less influential, to make Mr. Bryan the Democratic candidate in 1908. Of course there can be no considerable faction of the Democracy so utterly gone daft as to wish, under the present relative positions of gold and silver, to fight over again the battle of the standards. It is highly improbable that Mr. Bryan contemplates a revival of the hoodoo. But it will not be forgotten readily that he has used his controlling influence upon the Democratic party so potentially and so disastrously to that party as to leave 16 to 1 the latest of its platform declarations on the currency.

The Commoner objects to The Washington Post's remark that the Democratic party "needs to forget the Chicago platform." It adds, among other statements equally extravagant, that "you could almost palm off the Chicago platform as a Republican editorial in some sections of this country." If the Democracy needs anything, it needs to cut loose from all sorts of rotten-money schemes. For forty years it has been experimenting with financial delusions. Happening to elect a sound-money citizen to the Presidency, and he being honest and brave enough to do his duty by preventing currency debasement, the party repudiated him and plunged into the 16 to 1 delusion under the lead of Bryan. Has it not suffered sufficiently for its financial blundering to cure it of that fateful tendency? And what but harm to the party can come of flaunting at this time the legend proclaiming the vitality of the platform that is remembered only for its great and overwhelmingly condemned mistake? Not only does the Democracy need to forget the Chicago platform, but the country needs that the Democracy should forget it and climb to higher and safer ground. For the abdication of the Democracy on the heels of its first complete victory since 1856, the only victory that clothed it with both executive and legislative power, has been a misfortune to the country. There is always need of a strong and safe opposition party, an opposition strong enough to really oppose. Democratic impotency since 1894 has been a national misfortune.

[Extracts from the English translation of British Imperialism and Commercial Supremacy, by Victor Berard, London, 1906, pp. 67 et seq., showing a great French economist's view of the encroachments of American trade upon English and German trade in foreign countries, and affording excellent illustrations of dumping.]

But danger does not only threaten on the German horizon; another enemy, after having successfully conquered the other oceans, is beginning to appear in European waters. Agricultural America is the inventor of the best machines and implements for modern agriculture. In the Baltic Sea and in the Black Sea, at Riga, at Stockholm, at Odessa, American machines are preferred; German industry alone, by reason of its cheap articles, has been able to maintain the struggle. American bicycles and sewing machines have driven similar English productions from Germany, Italy, and France. At Barcelona the Americans have tendered for the laying of electric trams, and their watches are sold in all the European bazars. But they seek to monopolize all the Americas, Asia, and the entire Pacific world. Their manuafctures have already conquered the American shores of both oceans. To-day all the intervening ports, from New York to Buenos Ayres and from San Francisco to Chile, receive their machines and tools. German and Belgian competition had already compromised the monopoly which was once enjoyed by Sheffield and Birmingham in the South American continent.

"In Chile," writes the consul of Valparaiso, "the first blow was dealt to our trade by the International Exhibition held at Santiago, in 1875, under the auspices of the Germans, French, and Belgians. At that time we supplied 41 per cent of the total imports into the country; the ensuing year we had no more than 37 per cent, and each year has shown a further shrinkage ever since. German machines, German clocks and watches have monopolized the market. From 1880 onward, American wares became an economic factor in the situation; to-day all agricultural machines and implements arrive here from the United States. German cutlery with English marks is on show in all the shop windows. American saws are much preferred. We continue to lose ground; Belgian iron wire and American nails are considered superior to ours. The greater part of the hardware trade is in the hands of the Germans. But the efforts of the Americans are making themselves increasingly felt. Chicago firms have sent their agents to study our market."

"In Peru," says the consul of Callao, "English trade in other articles is still prosperous. But as for implements, we are rapidly losing our once dominant position. American implements, on account of their finish and cheapness, are held in higher esteem than ours to-day. Plows come exclusively from the United States; it seems as though the English manufacturer can not or will not supply the model asked for. Iron sheets are American. English locks, too heavy and too dear, and of an obsolete type, have been replaced by the German, American, or French locks."

"America has swallowed up the Mexican trade. One by one English houses withdraw. Brazil, once upon a time a big and good customer, now rejects English articles. Earthenware and glass are of German origin, lamps of Belgian, needles and sewing machines of German. The United States have appeared on the scene with jewelry and agricultural machinery; they seem ready to lose, in the first instance, all the money necessary in order to obtain the eventual monopoly. Argentina, the pet financial sphere of the stock exchange and English banks, has for some time past had cause to remark the influx of German capitalists and German enterprise; the tramways are in German hands. Nails, iron wire, posts, and rails arrive from Belgium and Germany. In the big bazaars of Buenos Ayres, German agents offer German cutlery with English marks at absurdly low prices. The Americans next appear on the scene. Their mowing and reaping machines are already preferred on account of their light weight and cheapness. Other successes are sure to follow."

In short the whole of South and Central America seem as though they must be indissolubly tied to the industrial centers of Pitsburg and Chicago. But what will be the eventual destiny of the Pacific market if the interoceanic canal is ever cut, so that the productions of Pennsylvania may be transported over a continuous waterway by the Mississippi and the seas to Japan, China, and Australia? Without even awaiting the opening of the canal, what will be the future of the far eastern market when the Americans have at length effectively occupied the Philippines? Already great efforts seem to have been put forth in order to find customers for American iron in Asiatic Oceania, and even as far as South Africa. A regular "trans-Pacific" mercantile service has been established which has passed almost unnoticed.

"The Northern Pacific Steamship Company," writes the consul of Portland, Oreg., "has established headquarters at the American port of Tacoma and founded a considerable trans-Pacific traffic, which is principally fed by raw or manufactured iron exported from America and articles taken by way of exchange, viz: Chinese rice, Japanese silks, African wheat, and Australian wool. Other American companies—the Pacific Mail, Pacific Coast, etc.—have their headquarters at San Francisco and do a similar trade. The Japanese companies of Kobe and Yokohama, especially the Nippon Yusin Kaisha, complete this network of trade routes, and by this means American irons find their way into China, Japan, Australia, and even the Cape."

"The American surplus production," writes the English consul at Tokyo, "has flooded our market with nails, rails, and locomotives, which are sold at ridiculously low prices with fixed intent to destroy local prejudice, which has a preference for European articles. Our English articles still occupy the first rank, but latterly American and German shipping companies have opened up an important trade with the coast of California. The United States have a great advantage over us on account of proximity, and more particularly on account of their export of raw articles. They will change their iron and manufactures against the silk and rice, which they come and fetch; they are to-day Japan's largest customers."

"To the Chinese market America began by exporting petroleum and wheat. They, in fact, still remain the two principal articles of export. But others follow in their train. In 1895 machinery accounted for £13,000, and for £26,000 in 1897. Implements and saws, nails and hardware, have grown fivefold in two years. Present figures give no idea of what this trade is destined to become. Americans reckon on the China market growing rapidly into one of their best customers for all these articles. Their success in Japan proves that, so far as rails, locomotives, and railway materials are concerned, they can beat all comers."

In Australia American tools have held the market since 1889. Surgical instruments commence to find favor, and already they have the reputation of being better finished. Musical instruments, watches, clocks, wire, nails, iron tubes, arrive from London, but they are merely German or American articles reexported from England. As for hardware and toys, the Americans have earned a reputation for skillful and conscientious work. Germans can only compete with them by copying their models.

"In 1895 American exports to South Africa amounted to £1,000,000, the progress having been continuous since 1892. In 1896 they were doubled and exceeded £2,000,000. Enormous quantities of bicycles, furniture, and agricultural plants are sent there; old-fashioned agricultural machines which are obsolete in America find there a satisfactory outlet. Cargoes are of the most varied description, viz, hardware, locks, door and window frames, pig iron and cast iron, etc. The Cape has a large demand for vehicles, tables, chairs, tools, etc."

From America the consuls sound a note of warning as to the formidable organization which sooner or later will throw rails, billets, machines, raw and manufactured metals on the markets of the world at extremely low prices.

MAGNIFICENT CONDITION OF THE NATIONAL TREASURY AT THE CLOSE OF THE FISCAL YEAR 1906.

The first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress will come to an end on the 30th of June, 1906, the last day of the fiscal year. During the closing hours of this session—after nine years of Republican administration—the nation will be making record marks in three branches of her financial operations.

First. When the books close on the night of June 30 the annual customs receipts will, for the first time, have passed the $300,000,000 mark.

Second. Our aggregate foreign trade will have crossed, for the first time, the $3,000,000,000 mark, with exports over $500,000,000 in excess of imports.

Third. The total stock of gold in the Treasury will have passed for the first time the $800,000,000 mark.

Seven years ago our interest-bearing debt was $1,046,048,750 and our annual interest charge was $40,160,000; while to-day the principal of the debt is only $895,158,340, and the annual interest charge has been reduced to $24,590,944.

During this fiscal year our receipts will exceed our expenses by about $25,000,000, and we will have in the Treasury about $175,000,000 available cash balance, over and above all current indebtedness.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not entitled to the floor, having already had an hour for debate since this discussion under this bill commenced, which he yielded, it is true, to other persons, but under the rule he is not entitled to the floor——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I leave that to the Chair without discussion. I suppose the gentleman's object is take up my time.

Mr. PAYNE. My simple object is——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will leave the gentleman's point of order to the Chair without discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that no arrangement has been made for control of the time except by the Chair. The gentleman from Mississippi last night yielded the floor, but the gentleman from Mississippi had no time in his control. And to-night the gentleman from Mississippi has asked, since the commencement of the address of the gentleman from Illinois, that the time on his side be divided according to a schedule which those whom the Chair had agreed to recognize had concurred in. Since then, by their consent, as I understand from the gentleman from Mississippi, four minutes has been permitted to be taken from their time that he may reply to the gentleman from Illinois in regard to certain statements. So the Chair is not taking time from others.

Mr. PAYNE. The Chair holds that the gentleman is entitled to an hour to-night?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is not entitled to any time to-night except that yielded by others, and at 9.30 the floor will be given to the other side of the House, and those promised recognition have arranged to allow the gentleman from Mississippi four minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. How can the gentleman from Mississippi take away the control of the time from the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman is simply taking up the time due this side of the House, let him say so frankly. He is too well acquainted with the rules of the House to imagine for a moment that there is anything parliamentary in what he is trying to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has no control of the time.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] have control of the time until 11 o'clock to-night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for what?

The CHAIRMAN. That the gentleman from Mississippi have control of the time until 11 o'clock to-night. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I would decline to take control of the time even if it were granted to me, unless it comes under the rule of the House, and the rule of the House has put the time under the control of the Chairman. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for four minutes. This can not be granted if the House here wanted, and the gentleman from New York knows that. I suppose the gentleman's game is to take the four minutes intended to be given me. If that is so, let him frankly say so.

Mr. PAYNE. The time in general debate is controlled by the Chairman, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from New York is not in order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has a right to proceed until 11 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the two minutes, or whatever it is, has not been taken out of my time, or any other time on this side.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is inimitable; but even to a wit or humorist a fact—the truth—is or ought to be precious. So far as the cotton part of the gentleman's speech is concerned, it displays these things: Ignorance, a pretense of knowledge where none exists, an empty assertion as a fact of a thing which is not a fact. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, as to the cotton facts. If the gentleman had taken the trouble to inform himself, he would have found that, in cotton parlance, there may be roughly said to be four kinds of cotton raised in this country: First, "short staple," or "upland;" second, "benders;" third, "long staple," and fourth, "sea island." The bill of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], brought before the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL], and upon which he interrogated me, did not refer to "sea-island" cotton at all. It referred to long-staple cotton, because it was intended to check the importation of Egyptian cotton, which comes chiefly into competition with "long staple," which runs, in length of staple, from one and a quarter to sometimes one and three-quarters inches. "Sea island" is much longer and is worth nearly twice as much, and proposed to put a tax of 10 cents a pound on that cotton in the lint and 4 cents on that cotton in the seed. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] was right when he said that sea-island cotton is not raised in the State of Mississippi or anywhere outside of "the sea islands" off Georgia and off South Carolina and Florida. But Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, parts of Alabama, and small parts of nearly all the other cotton States raise "long-staple" cotton. Now, the gentleman, I suppose, aimed to be somewhat humorous in intent, no doubt, but it is a point of honor, I think, that, even when indulging in humor, the humorist should stop short of impugning the veracity or sincerity of honorable people. His intent was to impugn by insinuation my sincerity and veracity.

Mr. BOUTELL. Not at all; simply a mistake the gentleman made I referred to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was not a mistake.

Mr. BOUTELL. A very palpable one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And it could not be a mistake. Mississippi either raised long staple or it did not raise it; and I raised it myself or I did not. It could not have been a mistake. It was absolutely impossible. Mississippi does raise long-staple cotton, and I raise long-staple cotton, and any assertion to the contrary is absolutely untrue. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I am not a watch expert, but I do know something about cotton. [Laughter.] If the other "facts" in the gentleman's speech are as far away from the real fact—that is, the truth—as his assertions on the cotton question, and if his knowledge of other matters alleged by him is equal to his lack of knowledge as displayed in his assertions in regard to cottons, then I pity his situation.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has half a minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much have I taken?

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I will not.

Mr. BOUTELL. Not in the interest of absolute truth?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will not yield any courtesy of any description, Mr. Chairman, to a man who undertakes even by insinuation or under the license of humor to impugn my veracity. I do not yield.

Mr. BOUTELL. The "gentleman from Illinois" has not attempted to impugn the veracity of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have finished.

Mr. BOUTELL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT] is recognized for fifty-five minutes.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few suggestions of fact in reference to a matter which has attracted the attention of the Congress of the United States and of the country for quite a number of years. I refer to what is known as the "ship-subsidy proposition." The first determined effort to enact legislation of this character was made in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and under the leadership of Senator Hanna a bill was passed by the Senate and came over to the House and was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I was then a member, and of which I have been continuously a member since that time.

That bill was favorably reported by the Republican members of the committee unanimously. The Democrats of the committee were united in their opposition to it; yet, notwithstanding that unanimous Republican report, there was so much opposition in the House to that kind of legislation that its friends were never able to get consideration of it after it was placed upon the Calendar, and it died with the expiration of the Fifty-sixth Congress. In the Fifty-seventh Congress the same kind of legislation was proposed, but resulted in nothing.

About the close of the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress a law was enacted creating the Merchant Marine Commission, composed of five Senators and five Members of the House. Four of those, two from the Senate and two from the House, were Democrats; and I had the honor of being one of those two Democrats from the House. That Commission, during the summer and fall of 1904, visited every important port on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf coasts, and the Great Lakes. A mass of testimony was taken, representing the different views as to what was the best method for upbuilding the American merchant marine. The Commission made a report. This testimony was printed in three volumes and presented to Congress. The majority of the Commission, the Republican members of the Commission, presented also a bill known as the "ship-subsidy bill." That bill was passed during the second session of the Fifty-eighth Congress by the Senate and was again referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House, and again reported favorably by a majority of the committee, all the Republicans voting for it. The Democrats not only on the Commission, but the Democrats in both committees in the Fifty-sixth Congress and in the Fifty-eighth, presented minority views, opposing such legislation. The bill in the Fifty-eighth Congress had the same fate as that in the Fifty-sixth, and never reached consideration in the House. About the beginning of the present session of Congress bills were introduced in both Houses in line with the recommendations of the Merchant Marine Commission. The bill as then introduced differed materially from the bill which afterwards passed the Senate. That bill was heralded to the country as a remedy for all the evils from which the shipping interests of the country were suffering. One of the special arguments used was, that by the terms of that bill provision was made for a large increase in what is known as "tonnage taxes," and that from the funds derived from this source a great part of the expense of the subsidy proposition would be met without any expense to the Treasury.

In February of this year that bill passed the Senate, but when it left the Senate it had stricken from it the provision for tonnage taxes. It was done solely upon the ground that it was a provision for raising revenue and must therefore originate in the House. No other argument was presented. But a few days ago that Commission presented a supplemental report, in which they utterly repudiated their former contention in favor of tonnage taxes, and now it is left to stand alone upon the naked proposition of taking from the Treasury of the United States money and giving it to these shipbuilders and shipowners. That bill, since its passage by the Senate, has been pending before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and for the first time in the history of that committee, in the consideration of this question, the Democrats have been reenforced by a number of thoughtful and intelligent Western Republicans who are earnestly opposed to this proposition, and we have every hope that the bill will never be able to get out of the committee room. It has been claimed in certain quarters that a majority of the committee is favorable to the bill. I am in a position to know that this is not true. Every possible effort has been made to secure favorable action without result. The members of the committee, Democrats and Republicans, who are opposing it do so on principle, and I do not believe that any influence can ever drive them from their position.

I make this speech now because I wish to show to the House and to the country how fallacious are the arguments relied upon by the advocates of the measure.

A number of reasons have been offered in support of this character of legislation, some of them with apparently plausible ground, but the whole scheme resolves itself at last into one proposition, which is of a twofold nature—first, that it costs more to build a ship in an American yard than it does in a foreign, and, second, that it costs more to operate a ship under the American than under a foreign flag. All of these subsidy bills profess to have for their fundamental object the equalizing of these differences in cost of construction and operation. It is proposed that this shall be done by a gift of a sufficient sum of money from the United States Treasury to enable our shipbuilders and shipowners to successfully construct and operate their vessels in opposition to their foreign competitors. Other incidents are added arguendo; but in the final analysis of all these propositions it resolves itself at last into the bald, naked, unholy effort to take, by the exercise of the Federal power, money contributed by way of taxation from all the people engaged in every other vocation and give it to these two classes of shipbuilders and shipowners to enable them to more successfully conduct their private business affairs.

The advocates of this kind of legalized robbery of the masses for the benefit of the favored few are loud in their quotation of Thomas Jefferson in support of their pet theory. Perhaps the strongest expression of Jefferson to which they refer in this contention is found in this language:

> The materials for maintaining our due share of navigation are ours in abundance, and as to the mode of using them we have only to adopt the principles of those who thus put us on the defensive or others equivalent and better fitted to our circumstances. (American State Papers, Foreign Relations, Vol. I, p. 303.)

That was the age of wooden ships, and the "abundance of materials" referred to was the almost unlimited supply of the finest timber in the world to be found in our virgin forests. England at that time was almost our only competitor in the carrying of our commerce, and, smarting under the result of the Revolutionary war and the loss of her American colonies, she was endeavoring by hostile legislation and unjust discriminations to strangle our infant merchant marine. These efforts were met by our policy of discriminating duties upon imports so successfully pursued until it was unwisely surrendered. Our abundant materials were utilized, and with the skill and enterprise of American artisans and sailors we soon built up fleets of seagoing vessels which carried more than three-fourths of all our commerce. This was the Jeffersonian policy, but this newborn idea of subsidies was never dreamed of. If it be true that the spirits of the departed are permitted to revisit the earth or take cognizance of what is going on here, the shade of the father and great apostle of Democracy would be horrified to learn that, in the fertile imagination of these advocates of ship subsidy, his utterances have been distorted into such radical conflict with his great and cherished doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." Gentlemen are hard pressed for argument when they undertake to align Thomas Jefferson under the piratical banner of those who are seeking to plunder the masses for the benefit of the classes. [Applause.]

It is true that the day of the wooden ship has passed, but we still have an abundance of the materials used in modern shipbuilding. We have the iron and the coal in the same field. We have the skilled mechanics, who are said by all disinterested witnesses to be the best in the world and capable of doing better work and more of it than any others. Only a few years ago the Russian Government wanted some battle ships built, and a French company offered to take the contract and complete the work in five years. On account of the political and financial relations existing between Russia and France, the French company was preferred, but the Cramp Ship Building Company at Philadelphia took the contract to do the work in thirty months—just half the time, and at less cost. This same company competed successfully with the world in building battle ships for Japan about the same time. This work was done at a time when steel was higher in American markets than in foreign, whereas it is now said to cost no more, if not less.

DIFFERENCE IN COST OF BUILDING HERE AND ABROAD.

Mr. William Livingstone, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, of Detroit, Mich., in testifying before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries a few days ago, said: "I think the statistics show that our best skilled workmen do turn out more work in a given number of hours than they do across the water. We pay more wages, but I think they earn them, as a general proposition. When the conditions are right, I think now the difference between the cost of a ship built abroad and our American ship built at home has very largely disappeared. Perhaps the difference has not entirely disappeared, but to quite an extent."

This witness also stated that a steel steamship of 10,000 gross tons was completed and ready for business last November—in just two months and twenty days from the time of laying her keel—and another of about the same size has been launched and will be completed in about five days shorter time than the other. No shipyard in the world has ever equaled this.

At the beginning of the agitation of this subsidy question it was argued that the cost of material in our shipyards was very much greater than in foreign yards, but now all admit that this difference has disappeared, or, at least, there is no reason why it should exist. But these patriots must have some excuse for putting their hands in the public Treasury, and they now say that there is about 25 per cent difference in the cost of labor, and are asking Congress to make up that difference. There is a hopeless conflict in the statements of these subsidy advocates. One class contends that the mechanics have no steady employment. One of these who appeared before the committee a few days ago complained rather bitterly that sometimes instead of getting from $3 to $4.50 a day he had to work for $1.50 to $2, and this little colloquy occurred:

> Mr. SPIGHT. I want to ask you this question: I understand now that your men when employed get from $3 to $4.50 a day.
> Mr. DONAHUE. Yes.
> Mr. SPIGHT. Now, you think in order to give that wage to more of your men that the millions of other American citizens who work year in and year out at not to exceed $1 a day ought to be taxed to give more profitable work to your men? Is that your idea?
> Mr. DONAHUE. That is my idea. They should be taxed.

I quote this as a sample of the spirit which animates many of these would-be grafters.

In opposition to the statement of this man and some others, who testified that there is no steady employment for this class of laborers, is the testimony of Mr. Edwin S. Cramp, vice-president of the great Cramp Ship Building Company, of Philadelphia. When he was before the committee this conversation occurred:

> Mr. WILSON. Do you have any trouble in finding plenty of labor for your yard?
> Mr. CRAMP. Of course, in good times we always have trouble in finding the best men. For a number of years the amount of such labor available has been very small. I do not suppose in the history of the country there has been a time when labor has been so well employed as it has been during the last four or five years.
> Mr. WILSON. A good mechanic coming to your yard could secure employment now?
> Mr. CRAMP. Yes, sir.

In 1904 this same Mr. Cramp said, while testifying before the Merchant Marine Commission, that at the beginning of the McKinley Administration the cost of ships in America had approximated the cost of the ships of a similar type by first-class builders in England within 10 or 15 per cent, and that was when steel was much higher in this country than in England.

In 1904 steel was worth in this country $40 per ton and $25 in England, a difference against America of about 60 per cent. Mr. Cramp then estimated the difference between the cost of construction of ships in American and foreign yards at 40 per cent. It must be understood that this estimate of difference in the cost of construction included both the cost of material and labor. The accepted estimate of difference in cost of labor is 25 per cent, which is certainly no greater now than it was in 1904, when, according to Mr. Cramp, the total difference was not more than 40 per cent, all of which has been wiped out by the present approximate equality in the cost of material. The fact is that the estimate of difference as stated by Mr. Cramp is too great. I remember that Mr. Clyde, a large owner and manager of steamships, stated to the Commission when we were in New York that the difference in cost of construction at that time (May, 1904) was only 25 per cent. Mr. James C. Wallace, of the American Ship Building Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, stated before the Commission at Cleveland in June, 1904, that in 1900 his company built two large tramp steamers for the ocean trade for about the same they would have cost in English yards. At that time steel cost more here than in England. Now it is or ought to be about equal in price, and experienced shipbuilders say ours is better in quality.

In the Grand Review of March, 1900, Mr. George Veulersse, a distinguished French economist and writer, in an article entitled "The expansion of America," said:

To-day ships can be built at Bath, San Francisco, Wilmington, Chester, and Newport News as cheaply as anywhere in the world.

So much credit and importance was attached to this statement that it was quoted in our consular reports for that month.

Now that the difference in the cost of material, which was one of the battle cries in the beginning of this subsidy agitation, has been, by their testimony, eliminated, the advocates of this legislation are forced to fall back upon the labor question, upon which they "ring all the changes."

I may be permitted to stop here long enough to say that if no other good was accomplished by it, the Merchant Marine Commission of 1904 aided very materially in driving from cover the gigantic steel trust, which was systematically robbing the American people for its own enrichment. I remember with what horror the "stand-patters" on the Commission heard witness after witness of the highest respectability and greatest opportunities tell how American steel was delivered in foreign yards at prices far below those charged American consumers by the same manufacturers for the same products. I well remember that when this statement was first made the distinguished chairman of the Commission, Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, said:

I want to say, what I think I am privileged to say as chairman of this Commission, that if the situation is as has been described it is a great outrage.

Mr. WALLACE. We have thought so for some time, and we have thought that in some way it ought to be remedied.

The same facts were stated by many other men of equally high character, notably by Mr. G. W. Dickey, superintendent of the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, the largest shipbuilding plant on the Pacific coast. He told what he saw and knew, and neither Mr. Gary, of the steel trust, nor anybody else has ever denied or questioned the accuracy of Mr. Dickey's statement. He told the Commission at San Francisco in August, 1904, that the steel mills in this country were favoring the foreigner. He said, amongst other things:

In 1900 I was going through a shipyard in Dundee, Scotland, and they were building a vessel almost a duplicate of the California, that we were building here at the same time, and their material was being landed there from a vessel from New York, furnished by Carnegie & Co., who were furnishing the material for the California. They were paying £7 15s. 8d. per ton. We were paying £10 9s. 2d. It was supplied by the same people and the distance transported was about the same.

These prices when reduced to our currency made a difference of about $13.80 against the American builder. It has been estimated by expert shipbuilders that a vessel of 8,000 tons, which is now only medium in size, will require about 3,500 tons of steel. At the rate of difference given by Mr. Dickie the American builder would pay to the steel trust nearly $50,000 more for the material in his ship than the foreigner paid for his. It is a misnomer to call this a "profit," because the steel was sold at a profit to the foreigner. It is robbery under the guise of law, and the men engaged in this nefarious business are among the most persistent advocates of subsidy legislation. They have been robbing the shipbuilder until they have grown rich and arrogant, and now ask the people's representatives in the Congress of the United States to solemnly authorize them to rob the National Treasury and the toiling millions of the country who must bear the burden of taxation. Let others do as they may; speaking for myself, I will never vote for it, so help me God. I want it to go out to the country, too, that after a careful investigation I am able to say that, with possibly one exception, there is not a Democrat in either House of Congress who will vote for it. Standing side by side and shoulder to shoulder with us are some noble Republican Members from the great Middle West who will not "bow the knee to Baal." All honor to them. [Applause.]

So serious has become this question of discrimination against the home consumer in the price of steel that the subsidy advocates have found it necessary to contradict the evidence which has been presented, and a few days ago they had Mr. Gary, who is chairman of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation, commonly called the steel trust, which controls not less than 60 per cent of the steel output of the United States, and indirectly, perhaps, nearly all of it, appear before the committee to demolish the men who had dared to prefer these charges. To show how eager Mr. Gary was to "get down to his work," he began by denying a statement made before the Merchant Marine Commission in Cleveland, Ohio, June 28, 1904. Here is what he said:

Mr. GARY. Perhaps I ought to refer specifically to a statement made by Mr. Wallace, of Cleveland, Ohio, president of the American Shipbuilding Company, in which he says:

"Recently one of our largest steel mills sold abroad 100,000 tons of steel plate. They delivered it, I understand, at Belfast at $24 a ton."

On the next page, then, is this question by Representative GROSVENOR:

Q. I want to know who bought the steel plate you speak of.
A. Harlan & Wolff Company, Belfast.
Q. From whom did they buy it?
A. The United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. Gary, proceeding, said:

I notice that Mr. Wallace apparently speaks from information. If he had such information it is entirely unreliable. The statement is not founded in fact.

Mr. SPIGHT. Do you know of any steel company that has delivered goods in foreign yards cheaper than at the mill to the domestic consumer?

Mr. GARY. I do not. I know of no such case.

In this answer Mr. Gary displays a remarkable want of information, for a man in his position, to say the least of it.

Now, it must be borne in mind that one of the most important constituent members of the United States Steel Corporation is the Carnegie Steel Company, by whom the steel was sold to the Scotland yard mentioned by Mr. Dickie.

In the printed hearings of the Merchant Marine Commission the following is found:

Mr. WALLACE. Recently one of our largest steel mills sold abroad 100,000 tons of steel plate. They delivered it, I understand, at Belfast at $24 a ton. That would practically mean, with the ocean freights as they now are, $22 a ton at tide water. They are charging to-day, at Pittsburg, $32 a ton.

The CHAIRMAN. What does it cost to transport it from this country to Ireland?

Mr. WALLACE. As near as I understand, the rates at the present time are $2 a ton. That would be $22 a ton at tide water.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the freight from Pittsburg to tide water?

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is about $1.40 a ton. I am not positive about that, though.

Mayor JOHNSON. That would make $11.40 difference between the Pittsburg price to you and the price abroad.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. I am not positive about just what that rate is.

Mr. MINOR. Do they lay that down in Europe at the present time at that price?

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty-four dollars a ton in Belfast. They made no secret of it. It was published in all the papers at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume that in that instance you have cited, as to the sale of steel abroad, you have taken pains to verify it beyond a peradventure?

Mr. WALLACE. It was given to me by the assistant sales agent of the Carnegie Steel Company.

The testimony of Mr. Gary was considered so important by the friends of ship subsidy that advance sheets of it were published and sent, I suppose, to every Member of the House several days before the publication of the entire hearings.

Mr. Gary has been, perhaps not inappropriately, denominated "the defendant in the case." Every lawyer knows that in courts where the defendant is permitted to testify the rule of evidence is that his testimony is to be weighed and considered in connection with his interest in the result of the trial. Here the defendant is positively contradicted in a material matter by at least two disinterested witnesses. For two years this charge has been pending against him in the public records, and he is bound to have had notice of it, and not a word in denial has been heard until long after the testimony against him has been closed and the jury ready to return a verdict. It would have been far better for him to rely upon his evidence that the conditions are changed and that steel is now selling in the American and foreign markets at the same price; but he did not elect to do this, and "guilty as charged" is the verdict of public opinion.

But is it true that steel mills in this country are not discriminating against the domestic purchasers even now? And is it true that the prices of steel in this country and in foreign countries are practically the same, as the steel trust witnesses have testified? For answer to these questions I here offer an editorial clipping from a New York daily, The Press, of the 7th of May of this year, which contradicts both propositions:

All records in the exports of iron and steel material through New York and other Atlantic seaboard points were eclipsed last month when close on to 80,000 tons were consigned to almost every part of the civilized world. The heaviest increase was made in the shipment of steel billets, upward of 35,000 tons having gone abroad during April, as compared with 24,000 tons exported during the previous month. They are sold here for export at a price around $18 at the mills, whereas the existing quotation for billets for domestic consumption is $27.

It has been shown by recent testimony before the committee that the ocean freight on steel is about $2 per ton, which would make it cost $20 per ton delivered in foreign ports, against $27 to domestic purchasers. This difference of $7 per ton makes the comfortable sum of $245,000 extorted from the American consumer by the steel trust in the month of April on the item of steel billets shipped abroad from Atlantic ports alone. At the same ratio for one year this would amount to $2,740,000. This robbery of the American was going on at the very time when the witnesses of the steel trust were asking us to believe that the prices in Europe and America are the same and that steel is not sold more cheaply for export than for home use. Now, what reliance can we place on the evidence of such witnesses in any other statements they have made? There is an old Latin maxim familiar to every lawyer, "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus," which fits this case. [Applause.]

I haven't seen nor heard of any denial of this statement of the Press. It was found in the first column on the editorial page under large head lines, and is presumed to have been made with a full knowledge of the facts. But in order to verify it I wrote to the editor of the Press on the 8th of May, and received in reply the following statement, furnished by the gentleman who regularly supplies the paper with such information, and whose reliability is unquestioned. "I can say that the price in England (Wales) yesterday for steel billets was $22 a ton. As the freight between the mills here and Wales is around $4 a ton, American billets must be sold at $18 for export, as specified in the news story, in order to meet competition on the other side. The selling of billets for export at the price of $18, or around that figure, in order to meet the market conditions on the other side has been going on for a considerable time. Notwithstanding the contradictions of the steel-trust officials, any man posted in the metal trades here knows the fact of the discrepancy between the export and domestic prices of billets, rails, and, in fact, all iron and steel material."

Mr. Hanscom, of the Eastern Shipbuilding Company, New London, Conn., who appeared before us to advocate this subsidy legislation, stated that two or three years ago he had information that steel was shipped from here and landed on the Clyde at $19 or $20 a ton, when it was being sold to domestic purchasers for $32 to $38 a ton.

Notwithstanding this state of affairs, which Senator GALLINGER denounced as an outrage, nothing has been done to remedy this evil, and every proposition to revise the tariff schedules which makes possible this outrage upon the American people is met by the "stand-patters" with the stereotyped declaration that there is neither necessity nor demand for revision, and the robbery proceeds unchecked and unabashed. Gentlemen can not protect themselves by the comforting assurance that these facts are not established. They are proven by the testimony of a cloud of disinterested witnesses, and are denied by no one except the "defendant." Any jury of honest men in any court on such evidence would write a verdict of "guilty" in two minutes. You say: "When the tariff needs revising its friends will do it." The time is approaching when it will be revised, not by the friends of the tariff, but by the friends of the long-suffering American people. [Applause.]

THE COST OF LABOR IN AMERICAN SHIPYARDS.

I have already shown by a number of witnesses that the problem of higher labor in American than in foreign shipyards is more imaginary than real. The better opinion, as expressed by the men who have appeared before us, is that while the rate of wage is a little higher here the difference is largely overcome by greater efficiency, longer hours, and improved implements. As long ago as 1896 Mr. John Roach, the great shipbuilder, said:

The labor question is misstated. We are prepared to meet that difficulty and to ask no further legislation on the subject.

Admitting for the sake of the argument that labor in American shipyards is higher than in foreign, and that it is not overcome by the greater efficiency of our mechanics and other ameliorating causes, what shall Congress do about it? What authority have we to tax all the people in order to enable shipbuilders to pay higher wages to their employees? I do not believe it is right, nor do I believe it is necessary. The mechanics say that the benefit to them in ship subsidies would be steady employment. The shipbuilders say the good to them would be more work. Yet Mr. Cramp says he is employing 6,000 men now and needs more, and that every man who wants to work has employment. The trouble is that all these people have been demoralized by this ceaseless prating about subsidies. They want something for nothing, and they want the Government to give it to them. They have gone crazy on protection. Every man who appeared before the committee to advocate this proposed legislation made the keynote of his song "Everything is protected but the shipbuilding and shipowning industries; give it to us, too." If Congress would put a final quietus upon all this subsidy agitation, conditions would change. Tell the boilermakers who leave their shops to go out and clamor for more pay through Government help to go to work in some of the many fields of remunerative labor as millions of other toilers are doing. Tell the steel trusts to be satisfied with legitimate profits in their business instead of fattening upon robbery of both Government and people. Tell the shipowners to plow the seas with their craft or quit grumbling and plow the face of a generous soil, as millions of others as good as they are have done all their lives. [Applause.] Tell the shipbuilders to start the wheels of their machinery and do like Cramp and others are doing—build all the ships they can, give employment to all the men they need, and quit depending on the Government to help them. There is no estimating the stagnation that has resulted from this talk about Government aid.

DIFFERENCE IN COST OF OPERATION.

Practically driven from every other position, the advocates of this Government subsidy say that the cost of operation of ships under the American flag is so much greater than under foreign flags that our merchantmen are being driven from the high seas. It is true that the officers on American ships are paid somewhat higher wages than are paid on foreign ships, but the testimony is overwhelming that the wages of seamen are not controlled by the flag the ship flies, but by the port from which it sails and the destination, and that ships of all nationalities are governed by the same conditions. American ships are often manned by Chinamen and other cheap laborers just as ships of other nations, and hired at same prices. The impression is sometimes made that American ships are required to carry American crews, but this is not true, except as to officers. Practical and experienced seamen familiar with conditions on ships of all nationalities deny that wages are higher or food and accommodations better on American ships than on foreign. In the case of officers the wages on American ships are generally absolute, whereas on foreign vessels the officers are frequently paid so much in stated wages and a percentage of profits on the voyage. So that, taking it all together, the difference in the cost of operation does not amount to much after all.

It is not seriously contended that the proposed legislation will benefit the American seamen. They are all opposed to it, and all their unions on the coasts and on the Great Lakes have joined in denouncing it. In fact, as I will undertake to show later, it would work injustice and hardship to them and utterly fail in its pretended purpose to furnish recruits for the Navy.

It is shown by the testimony of Mr. William Livingstone, president of the Lake Carriers' Association, that the cost of operation on the Lakes is 25 per cent higher than on American ships in the foreign trade. There they are building new and large ships all the time, their freight rates are the lowest in the world, and yet they are prospering greatly. This is not merely because they are protected by the coastwise laws, for they are not only increasing the size of their fleets, but they are in sharp competition with trunk lines of railroads and Canadian shipping. The reason is to be found in the fact that, instead of hanging around the National Capitol begging for Government aid, they are building ships, navigating the waters, and attending to business. It must be borne in mind, too, that on account of the rigorous climate they are compelled to tie up for three or four months in the year. They are self-respecting, self-reliant typical Americans. If a great emergency should arise, from the crews of their vessels the Navy could be recruited with some of the best fighting men in the world, who would go upon the decks of our battle ships not as conscripts or part of the Naval Reserve, but because they are patriotic American citizens. [Applause.]

WHO ARE ASKING FOR SUBSIDIES?

If you watch the committee rooms of the Senate and House when this sort of legislation is under consideration, you will find that its persistent advocates are lobbyists for the steel trust, the shipbuilders, and the shipowners. Like vultures, they scent the carrion from afar and come in flocks and gather in the hallways and perch in the empty chairs in the committee rooms until some of us have been constrained to breathe the silent prayer, "From these birds of prey, good Lord, deliver us." They tell us with great unction what blessings would be bestowed upon the agricultural and laboring classes if they only had sense enough to consent to be taxed to pay annually millions of dollars, the product of their sweat and toil and privation, to still further enrich a favored few. With "tears in their voices" and lugubrious faces they talk to us about the fabulous sums that we are paying to foreigners for carrying our commerce, and what a fearful plight we would be in if we should become involved in a war with some foreign power. They prate with patriotic fervor about our need of auxiliary cruisers and scout ships in time of war and want of men to man our battle ships. They shudder at the thought of the fearful waste of the products of our fields and factories should England and some other great European power go to war, because there would not be merchant vessels to carry our goods to foreign markets. They do not tell us of the millions of American capital invested now in foreign shipping because of our repressive tariffs and our antiquated navigation laws, all of which ships, in an emergency, could be readily transferred to American registry under the protection of the American Flag. They don't tell us of the 75,000 hardy seamen engaged in our coastwise trade and on the Great Lakes who could be depended upon to enter the Navy in case of a grave necessity.

No seamen in either domestic or foreign trade favor this legislation, but, on the contrary, have denounced it as an effort to entrap them into more degrading conditions than now confront them. They have repeatedly appealed to Congress to relieve them of some of the onerous burdens they are now bearing, and they resent with scorn any pretense that the pending subsidy bill is in any sense helpful to them. They say, "We have asked for bread and you have given us a stone; for fish and you give us a serpent." Mr. Andrew Furuseth, of San Franciso, an exceedingly well-informed man, appeared before the committee as the accredited representative of all the seamen of the United States on coasts and lakes, and strongly urged their opposition to the bill. Amongst other things he said, "If you say you will pass the bill because the American seaman in the foreign trade gets more pay, lives better, has a better forecastle, and the vessel is better manned, then we say that is not the proper foundation on which to put it, because that is not true." Speaking of the effort in this bill to compel them to enlist as naval volunteers as one of the conditions upon which they may secure employment on a merchant vessel, Mr. Furuseth read the following as one of a series of resolutions adopted by the seamen's union:

> The bill provides that the shipowner must have a certain number of naval reserves to get the subsidy. This means that the seaman must be in the reserves in order to get the employment. This is conscription pure and simple, and we protest against being selected for this while the men may, under ordinary conditions, choose whether they will enlist or not until the nation needs all its men. It would compel us to be in the military service from 21 to 47 or quit the sea.
> Under such conditions we would rather quit the sea, since it would be notice to us that we must, as seamen, give up any hope of improvement in our lives. We have asked for laws in accord with American ideas and we are getting more servitude and discriminations against us.

This, you understand, is not the position or expression of Mr. Furuseth or any single individual, but is the solemn pronouncement of all the seamen in the United States. It is worse than nonsense to talk about enlisting a naval reserve under the provisions of this bill from a body of men who entertain this feeling in regard to it. It has been said that the American boy no longer wishes to go to sea. This is true, because he can find more profitable, congenial, and honorable employment in other vocations. It would seem harsh to say that the life of a seaman is a dishonorable one, but it will be better understood when it is remembered that he is in a class all to himself. He is practically the only American citizen who is subject to arrest as a criminal and imprisonment for violation of a civil contract. He is the only American citizen who may be lawfully arrested for forfeiture in a foreign country of a contract with another American citizen and imprisoned and held for extradition or returned to his master, the shipowner.

Need there be any surprise that under these degrading conditions boys who have been brought up in American homes and taught to revere the rights of man and to love human liberty seek other employment rather than place the shackles upon their own limbs by adopting a seafaring life? If to these repulsive conditions now existing there be added compulsory enlistment in the naval reserve as provided by this bill, where will you get your seamen in the over-sea trade? To my mind it is thus conclusively demonstrated that another one of the reasons assigned for the necessity for subsidy legislation is a hollow sham, and would not result in adding anything to our naval strength.

There is pending before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries another bill introduced by me which meets the approval of the seamen and has for its object the improving of the conditions on all our vessels, whether engaged in the domestic or foreign trade. It is believed that if this bill were enacted into law it would not only add materially to the efficiency of the service in our merchant marine and the safety of life and property on the waters, but would also do much to encourage Americans to engage in this service by removing the repelling causes which now keep them out. This is to be accomplished without any subsidy and without any conscription by making the life more attractive and honorable. It will supply men trained and fitted for the naval service and leave it to their patriotism to man our war ships when needed. This is, at last, the only kind of men who can be relied upon to preserve the honor of our flag, whether upon land or sea.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS OPPOSED TO SUBSIDY.

Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, representing 3,000,000 or more of workingmen in every sphere of productive activity, appeared before the committee, by authority of this great organization, to protest against this kind of legislation. Mr. Gompers said, amongst other things, "I am against the general proposition of subsidies, but that is not the only reason. I am against the proposition to make the opportunity to earn a livelihood—to make it practically compulsory for a man to render himself a conscript in the naval service." He showed conclusively that the Federation of Labor had, in national convention, repeatedly declared against all subsidies, on both principle and policy.

FARMERS OPPOSED TO SUBSIDIES.

It would hardly appear necessary to argue that the great agricultural classes, who produce the wealth of the country, supply the commerce, and pay the taxes which support the Government, are opposed to any policy which takes from the masses of the people millions of dollars by way of taxation to add to the profits in the business of a favored few; but in some quarters it has been persistently argued that the farmers will be greatly benefited by the proposed subsidy policy. The only organized bodies composed exclusively of farmers which I know anything of in this country are the Farmers' Alliance and the Patrons of Husbandry. There have been and may now be some variation in the names by which they are known in different localities, but they are essentially the same in principle everywhere. There are other millions of farmers and farm laborers who belong to no organization, but are intelligent, patriotic American citizens. Not a word has come from any of these wealth producers in favor of subsidies. On the contrary, every expression from these organized bodies has been against the principle and the policy. As late as the 6th of April of this year the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry officially memorialized the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the present House of Representatives against the passage of the pending bill. In commenting on the transparent effort to mislead and deceive the country by the use of the sugar-coated term "subvention," instead of the more universally obnoxious ones of "bounty" and "subsidy," they say:

> A subsidy by any other name smells as rank, and the National Grange protests against the use of public revenues for "subvention" to a few persons as against "bounties or subsidies" to the same class of citizens.

Further, they say in their memorial, which I read at this point because their position is so strongly stated:

> The language of the bill is obscure, perhaps intentionally so, but it is clear that under it there would be taken during the next ten years, from the money raised by taxing the people of the whole country, about $50,000,000, which would be given to a small number of persons building or owning steam or sailing vessels. In return for this immense amount of money, what are the taxpayers of the country, and especially the farmers, to receive?
> It is claimed that as the result of this system of bounties the number of vessels built or owned by our citizens engaged in the foreign trade will be largely increased; that this will cause a reduction in freight rates, and that this saving in freight, in so far as it affects the exportation of farm products, would go largely to the American farmer. There is absolutely no proof of this contention, but on the contrary all past experience has shown that it is the foreign purchaser who gets the benefit of lower freight rates. Lower ocean rates mean lower rates from Canada, the Argentine Republic, Russia, India, Australia, and other competing countries, and as it is the competition of the products of those countries that fixes prices in the foreign market a reduction in freight charges would simply mean lower prices to the foreign consumer.

In fact, it can be shown that the result of the subsidy policy would be to encourage foreign competition with our farm products in neutral markets. If the effect of this legislation would be, as its advocates claim, to increase the number of vessels owned by citizens of the United States engaged in the foreign trade, it is evident that such vessels would displace a certain number of foreign vessels which are now carrying our farm products to foreign ports. These displaced freight vessels would have to seek freight elsewhere, and their owners would naturally try to increase the export trade in farm products of competing nations by carrying such products as cheaply as possible. The result would be to stimulate competition with our surplus farm products in the neutral markets in which they are now sold. It would seem that there is no good reason why the American farmer should tax himself in order that foreigners can buy our farm products at a lower price.

When challenged to show how the "subvention" scheme will benefit the farmers, its advocates fall back on vague generalities as to trade following the flag, and the increase in exports which they claim would result from having our goods shipped in vessels owned by our own citizens. But they have never been able to show that foreigners would buy more of our goods merely because they were shipped on American vessels instead of foreign vessels. Foreigners are very much like Americans in one respect, they want to buy things as cheap as possible, and they will buy American goods when they are as good and as cheap as those of other countries. If our goods can be sold cheap enough, the foreigner will buy them. If our products can not compete in price in neutral markets with those of other countries, we can not expect the foreigner to be so foolish as to pay more for the goods he wants just because they may be sent to him on an American-owned vessel. The subsidy advocates complain that the foreign vessel carries freight so cheaply that American ships can not compete. This means that American producers get their goods carried to other countries on foreign vessels cheaper than they can be carried on American vessels, and there is no ground for believing that the foreign buyer will take any more of our goods shipped on an American vessel than on a foreign ship.

It is urged by the subsidy hunters that the cost of building vessels in this country is so much greater than in foreign countries that a Government bounty is necessary in order to equalize conditions. As a matter of fact the chief item of additional cost of American vessels is the high price of the steel plates, frames, bolts, etc., that enter into the construction of a vessel. It is notorious that the United States Steel Company sells steel plates, etc., to foreign shipbuilders at prices far below those charged American shipbuilders, thus directly aiding to encourage foreign competition and discourage shipbuilding in this country. If the believers in bounties will aid in getting legislation under which the steel trust will have to sell its products in the United States as cheaply as it does in foreign countries, our shipbuilders will soon be able to compete successfully with their foreign rivals.

THE PRESS AGAINST IT.

The Democratic newspapers are practically a unit in their opposition to this bill. This is true also of many of the Republican and independent papers. I will take the time of the House to read only some short extracts from two of the latter class. The Washington Post is recognized as one of the ablest of all the great independent papers in the country, and in recent issues it has contained the following editorials upon this subject:

Our manufacturers compete in neutral markets throughout the world for trade in locomotives, steel rails, sewing machines, farm machinery, and scores of other products of skilled labor. Higher wages are paid in Pittsburg than in any other town on earth, and yet, daily and hourly, Pittsburg sends abroad cargo after cargo of manufactured products, and successfully competes with all the paupers in the world. And if we do not do the like in ship making it is because we will not, and not because we can not. To believe otherwise may not be exactly unpatriotic, but it is un-American.

Our shipmasters have the absolute monopoly of about the finest market for ships in the world—the coastwise trade. No foreign ship can engage in it, and, besides, no foreign-built ship can be sailed under the American flag in the foreign trade without an act of Congress authorizing it. With all that protection, or, rather, prohibition, it is in the nature of the scandalous if our ship makers are unable to compete with Belfast and Glasgow.

Again the Post says:

CONFLICTING CONGRESSIONAL "HEARINGS."

Before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was fairly through with the "hearings" on the ship subsidy, it proceeded to allow "hearings" in vindication of the steel trust. In the hearings granted to the shipmasters it was deposed and reiterated that the steel trust sold material for building ships to foreigners for considerably less than the same was sold to Americans. That fact was emphasized in the testimony of numerous witnesses, and it is one of the "conclusive arguments" with which Congress is deluged.

But those "arguments" are for subsidy only. The steel trust was much concerned, for it is manifest that the American people will put the enemies of protection to reforming the tariff if its office be for the benefit of foreigners, affording them lower prices for American goods than is exacted of the American customer; and so the steel trust came to town and demanded a "hearing."

As we have before remarked, you can establish whatever you please by a "hearing" before a committee of either House of Congress. Thus it had just been "established" that the steel trust so oppressed the shipbuilders that the latter could no longer do business unless the farmers hired them, by means of a subsidy, to continue in business. Of course that would have a tendency to make the steel trust unpopular, and Congress might be persuaded to "revise" the tariff on iron and steel. Hence the "hearing."

One of the head men of the steel trust, a Mr. Gary, appeared before the committee and said it was all a mistake, that there was no considerable difference in the domestic prices of steel products and the export prices. That was news to the committee, and it is news to the country. If it be true, there has been some tall lying done in this vicinity in the past half a dozen years.

The same paper says further:

The scheme to billet our shipyards on the United States Treasury and make them mendicants supported by public charity will hardly succeed this session. The bill has passed the Senate, but "subsidy" is an ugly word in the House, and it was not made much prettier by its understudy, "subvention." One who represents the tillers of the soil of the great Mississippi Valley will hesitate long before he imposes on the Treasury the duty of making good the losses of a self-confessed unprofitable business.

The excuses for this subsidy are: We can not make a ship as cheaply as foreigners, and if we could build it as cheaply, we can not operate it as cheaply. If that be so—and we do not believe it—it is best for the foreigner to build and operate the ship. We can make a sewing machine, a thrashing machine, a reaper, a mower, a railroad locomotive, steel rails, and a thousand other things cheaper than the foreigner can make them, and if we do not make a ship as cheaply it is because we will not, and not because we can not. Forty years ago our people thought it impossible to build a railroad across the continent without a subsidy. That notion cost the Government hundreds of millions. And yet James J. Hill built a Pacific railroad without a dollar of subsidy, and it is to-day the best one of the lot.

The New York Press, one of the great Republican dailies, which, though a staunch protectionist, is bold in denouncing many of the abuses which have grown up under a protective policy, has this to say of the pending bill:

THE SENATE SHIPPING PIRACY.

The ship-subsidy bill passed by the Senate ought not to receive even the courtesy of debate in the House. Divested of its sham virtues of naval reserves and fixed percentages of American seamen in the service, it is nothing but naked piracy against the United States Treasury to turn money into the hands of individuals already holding investments in shipping, but not satisfied with their financial returns.

The Senate piracy is not a bill to restore, enlarge, and maintain a flourishing shipping; it is a bill to fatten those already in the business, without creating a new merchant marine.

The people of this country do want a merchant navy. They realize that it must be built. They would favor any plan which embraced the creation of more shipping. From the Senate they would get nothing of the sort. They would, for the most part, only pay money into the hands of those owning existing shipping. This Senate scheme is not one to restore the merchant marine; it is one to enrich a few individuals, with absolutely no benefits following to the nation.

There is one way to assure enormous merchant fleets plying across the seas as successful and complete as the fleets on the Lakes and in the coastwise trade. There is no coastwise shipping anywhere else in the world to compare with ours. No subsidies have been called for by it. There is no whine for subventions; no lobbying for mail contracts. The powerful industry has grown and continues to grow, because it exists under a policy which provides business for it.

If there were a policy that provided business for transoceanic ships as for the coastwise vessels, capital would build and operate shipping for the ocean as for the Lakes and the coastwise traffic, and it would never ask nor want for subsidies; and the fleets, springing into being, would make money—they would flourish and increase. The American bottoms would regain the supremacy which they held on the oceans for half a century when the shipping policy of the nation provided business for American ships.

If the House is to make an effort to restore American shipping, and to provide that it shall be maintained as a self-supporting institution, it will waste no time on the Senate measure. It will insist on something that will provide business for American bottoms. A tonnage tax discriminating against foreign vessels engaged in the traffic with this country will do this; a discriminating tariff duty in favor of the vessel which sails into our ports under the Stars and Stripes will do it. Subsidy without business never will.

It will be observed that the Press advocates the old policy of discriminating duties and tonnage taxes under which, in our early history, we built up a magnificent merchant marine, and which was suggested by the report of the Democratic minority of the Merchant Marine Commision of 1904.

ENORMOUS COST.

What would be the cost of this scheme? The subsidy bill which passed the Senate in the Fifty-sixth Congress involved an annual expenditure from the public Treasury of $10,000,000 or $12,000,000. The friends of the pending bill claim that under this it would be very much less. Upon its face this is apparently true, but if, as its advocates claim, it should result in largely and rapidly increasing our tonnage there would necessarily be a heavy increase in the cost to the Government after the first year of its operation. What would be the ultimate cost if the policy once adopted should be adhered to no man can estimate. Some of the friends of the bill profess to believe that at the end of about ten years the shipping industry "will be on its feet," and it will be no longer necessary to continue the subsidies. I will not charge these men with a willful design to mislead the Congress of the United States and the American people, but I will say that if they are sincere in the expression of this opinion their judgment is worth so little that we can not afford to accept them as safe counselors on so momentous a question. Common sense ought to teach us that this is not true even though there were no object lessons to guide us. The fate of the Collins Line in the fifties has been and will be repeated every time under similar conditions. This line of the finest ships then afloat for a number of years received a subsidy of $850,000 a year, but when the bounty was withdrawn the line "went to pieces." Other instances of a similar kind might be enumerated. These examples were doubtless in the mind of Mr. CANNON, now the honored Speaker of this House, when in a speech in the Forty-fifth Congress in opposition to a mail subsidy to a steamship line to run to Brazil he said: "When the subsidy ceases the steamship line wil cease to be operated."

Mr. Loud, formerly a distinguished Republican Member of this House from California, noted alike for his courage and his candor, said to the committee a few days ago, in effect, that if the policy should be inaugurated it would have to be perpetual, and that if other countries retaliated by increasing subsidies to their vessels, we must keep pace with them by a corresponding increase to ours or else "go out of business." This is the prevailing opinion of the most intelligent and thoughtful men who testified before the Merchant Marine Commission and before the committee of this House during the month of April last. The only surprise to me is that anyone should doubt the correctness of it. Now, shall we engage in a subsidy war with the world? It has been truthfully said that our principal competitors in ocean freight carrying are England, Germany, and Norway, none of which countries subsidize their cargo vessels. If we inaugurate a system of subsidies to our freight carriers, both steam and sail, as is provided in this bill, certainly England and Germany, the two richest and most powerful of all Old World countries, will do the same thing. Then a "merry dance they would lead us," with the "innocent bystander," the oppresed American taxpayer, to "pay the fiddler." A few other countries, notably France, pay subsidies to cargo vessels. The French system is so ridiculous that it is falling to pieces of its own weight. For several years they have been operating under a mileage bounty, by which their ships might sail all around the world and earn a bounty without carrying a pound of freight. For this reason they lowered freight rates by underbidding so enormously that no other ships would compete with them. This was particularly true on the Pacific coast, where most of their business was done. Mr. Sewall, a large shipbuilder and shipowner of Bath, Me., said a few days ago that for a number of years his fleet was engaged profitably in carrying freight from New York to San Francisco and from San Francisco to Europe and competed successfuly with ships of all other nationalities until these French subsidized tramp steamers entered the trade and so reduced freight charges that no other ships could remain in the business. English vessels suffered just as he did. He says that he could reenter that trade now but for these cheap French ships.

When the Merchant Marine Commission was on the Pacific coast we were told that these subsidized French ships had so abused the law under which they were operating that millions of dollars of subsidies already earned were then unpaid, and it was predicted that the French Government would be compelled to change its policy. It appears that this prediction has been verified to some extent already, and that the French Parliament, during the month of April of this year, has practically repealed the old law and has substituted a very complicated system of daily tonnage bounties on all ships of 100 tons and upward upon proof that they have carried freight of a certain percentage of their gross registered tonnage, and that the freight has been carried on at least a given percentage of the mileage traveled. So that the old practice of sailing in ballast and drawing subsidies will be measurably abolished, and the cutthroat system under which they have been operating will be hedged about with greater difficulties, which will inure to the benefit of ships of other nations.

Notwithstanding bounties upon construction and extravagant subsidies on operation by the French Government, the increase in tonnage has been very unsatisfactory. In a period of thirteen years, from 1890 to 1903, the total increase of French tonnage of every class and character was about 400,000 tons—an average of about 30,000 tons a year. During that time the Government was paying nearly $9,000,000 a year subsidies on construction, navigation, and mail service. So that every ton of shipping added during that period cost the Government $300. Nearly half of that increase in tonnage was in sail vessels, and many of them wooden. According to Mr. Sewall, an experienced builder of sailing vessels, the cost of building such in his yards in Bath, Me., is about $50 a ton, including everything. This would show a net cost to the Government of $250 a ton a year for the operation of a vessel that cost the owner only $50 a ton to construct—certainly a most foolishly expensive way in which to build up a merchant marine. Yet subsidy grabbers refer us to the example of France in aiding the shipping industry.

It must be borne in mind, too, that not all of this increased tonnage was the product of French shipyards, because the law provided that foreign-built vessels might be admitted to domestic register and be allowed to participate in Government subsidies when owned by French citizens or corporations.

During the same period of thirteen years, from 1890 to 1903, there were added to the American merchant marine a total of 1,662,848 tons, without any Government aid except to a few vessels for carrying ocean mails. During the last half of the month of March of this year more than 34,000 tons were added to our tonnage, as shown by consular reports, and of this there were five steamers, averaging more than 6,000 tons each. At this rate we are increasing our tonnage immensely every year. We are persistently told that our merchant marine is decaying, and yet the Commissioner of Navigation in his last report shows that since 1881, when our tonnage was lower than it has been in more than fifty years, there has been a steady increase, and that during the year ended June 30, 1905, 165,000 were added to our total tonnage, bringing it up to about 6,500,000 tons, a million higher than it was in 1860 and 2,500,000 higher than in 1881. This leaves out of consideration about 200,000 tons owned outright by American citizens, besides more than 1,000,000 tons owned largely by American citizens and all under foreign flags. Next to Great Britain we have the largest merchant marine in the world, including American-owned vessels under foreign flags. We may never equal the British Empire, nor is it necessary that we should. England is essentially a maritime nation. We are not. Our wealth is in our fields, our forests, our mines, and our factories, which furnish the most profitable investment for our energies and our capital, and we can not be expected to desert these for the less profitable and more hazardous business of "going down to the sea in ships."

While it is true that the tonnage under the American flag in the foreign trade is only about 950,000, it is not true that it has been decreasing during the last ten years, but it is now larger than it has been since 1890. About that time began the subsidy agitation, and in 1898, under the depressing influence of demand for Government aid, it fell to 726,000 tons, the lowest point it has ever reached since 1839. Our tonage in the foreign trade increased more than 50,000 tons last year, and at the same rate of increase we should have now at least 1,000,000 tons.

THREAT THAT SHIPS WILL BE SOLD TO FOREIGNERS.

Not satisfied with begging for subsidies, we are told that unless the Government opens its vaults to the shipowners they will sell their vessels to men or corporations who will put them under a foreign flag. Neither the American people nor their representatives in Congress will be gravely disturbed by these threats. No matter under what flag they are operated, they will still carry our exports and imports, and the American people will not be the losers. We have the money with which to pay the freights, and it is all nonsense to say our products can not be transported to the markets unless we have ships of our own to carry them. Our fields and factories, more than those of any other country, feed and clothe the world, and if we can not send our products abroad the millions who need them will send after them.

NOT HOSTILE TO SHIPPING INTERESTS.

The advocates of subsidies try to make it appear that we who oppose such legislation are unpatriotic and are enemies of the American merchant marine. Neither is true. If a desire to protect the great masses of the people from legalized robbery for the benefit of a favored few be unpatriotic, then we plead guilty, and without any shame. [Applause.] We do not impugn the motives of other Members of Congress who disagree with us on this question, but leave them to answer their own consciences and the judgment of their own constituents. We accept for ourselves the same tests, and are ready to abide the decision. Not one of us would not be glad to see our merchant vessels, under the American flag, plowing the waters of every sea; but desirable as this result may be, we are not willing, for its accomplishment, to violate every principle of sound economy and sacrifice upon the altar of private greed the paramount interest of the millions of Americans who by their sweat and toil support the Government in times of peace and ever stand ready, in the emergency of war, to defend with their lives, on field or flood, the flag of their country. [Great applause.]

Mr. RHINOCK. Mr. Chairman, on February 22, 1906, it was my pleasure to introduce in the House of Representatives a bill (H. R. 15438) which had for its title the following words: "A bill to declare certain persons, firms, associations, and corporations to be common carriers and subject them to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act."

The bill was a short one and was couched in the following language:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons, firms, associations, and corporations operating any pipe line or lines for the transportation or conveyance of oils or other liquids from one place in any Territory of the United States to any other place in the same Territory are hereby declared to be common carriers and shall be subject to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof in so far as same can be applied.

SEC. 2. That all persons, firms, associations, and corporations operating any pipe line or lines for the transportation or conveyance of oil or other liquids from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia into any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia are hereby declared to be common carriers engaged in interstate commerce and shall be subject to the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof in so far as same can be applied.

In the earlier days of this session of Congress this body took up what is popularly called the "rate bill"—H. R. 12987—"a bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," and by an almost unanimous vote passed it.

This bill went to the Senate of the United States, where it has been debated, amended, passed, and sent back for our consideration. One of the amendments favorably considered by the Senate is known as the "Lodge amendment," being proposed by Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, and accomplished in part the object of my bill. The Lodge amendment as finally modified by the Senate was in the following language:

Any corporation or any person or persons engaged in the transportation of oil or other commodity, except water and except natural or artificial gas, by means of pipe lines or partly by pipe lines and partly by railroad or partly by pipe lines and partly by water, who shall be considered and held to be common carriers within the meaning and purpose of this act.

This amendment of Senator LODGE was introduced by him on April 16, and was adopted by the Senate in Committee of the Whole on May 4, 1906.

It will thus be seen that the bill I introduced in February last is, in general terms, almost the same as the Lodge amendment adopted by the Senate of the United States.

The bill introduced by myself was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and will never be reported if the railroad rate bill with the Lodge amendment as passed by the Senate shall be accepted by the House.

The acceptance of the rate bill as amended will make the passage of a separate bill entirely unnecessary, and I now address the House as not only in favor of the railroad rate bill as we passed it some time ago, but more decidedly favoring it since the Senate has improved it, as I think, by incorporating the amendment relative to pipe lines for oil as an amendment to the original bill.

I have no desire to detract one iota of credit from Senator LODGE nor to assume too much credit to myself for the introduction of the bill.

Mr. SULZER. I understand that provision has been stricken out of the rate bill.

Mr. RHINOCK. No; it has not.

Mr. JAMES. My colleague is correct. The provision upon which the gentleman from Kentucky is addressing the House has not been stricken out by the conferees. That provision remains in. The only language which has been stricken out, which the gentleman from New York undoubtedly has in mind, is a proposition relative to a common carrier not carrying its own products. A majority of the conferees agreed to strike out "common carrier" and insert in lieu thereof the word railroad," so as to make this provision not apply to oil companies, but the Senate refused to accept this report of the conferees, and I sincerely trust that it will not accept it, and that oil companies will be denied the right to be in the transportation business and at the same time in the monopolization of oil or other products.

Mr. SULZER. I am in favor of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. RHINOCK. I thank the gentleman from New York, and I am heartily in accord with the statement made by Mr. JAMES.

As has been well said upon another occasion, "There is glory enought for all," [applause] and the privilege of voting for the provisions of the Lodge amendment will be glory enough for me. I want pipe lines to be common carriers under the law, and whether that end shall be reached under the separate bill introduced by me last February or by the adoption of the Lodge amendment to the Senate bill is immaterial.

Conformably to this idea, when I heard that Senator LODGE had announced his intention of introducing a pipe-line amendment I addressed him a letter of approval and transmitted to him for his use a number of letters from oil companies and manufacturers. The Senator responded, thanking me for the assistance rendered and hoping that the pipe-line agitation might result in an appropriate law. I am decidedly in favor of this pipe-line legislation, as are the vast majority of the people of my State and of the country. [Applause.]

It has been suggested that pipe lines for oil are private lines, private property, and that this legislation will affect them injuriously. If they are private lines, this bill will not affect them at all. No bill that we could pass would legally affect a strictly private line. The contention is, however, that all of the pipe lines now doing business throughout the country are public and not mere private lines. It is true that they claim that they only transport their own oil—that they carry only their own goods.

But this claim comes too late. They have already proclaimed themselves as common carriers by exercising the rights of eminent domain and can not now claim the immunity of a private line. These lines run not upon the property of the men who own them, but run from farm to farm, from county to county, and from State to State.

No objection of private landholders has been sufficient to keep them from laying their lines. When objections were made the companies proceeded to condemn under the law of eminent domain. They took private property for the only use they could lawfully take it, viz, a public use, and they can not now claim that their lines are merely private property.

Nor is this all. The mere fact that pipe-line companies do not do a general business for the public is not sufficient to keep them from the regulative operations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The highest court of the land, the Supreme Court of the United States, has passed upon this question in a case that came up from Minnesota. In 1893 Minnesota passed a law providing that all warehouses and elevators for storing and handling grain along the route of any railroad should be subject to the control and jurisdiction of the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission.

There was an elevator company in Lanesboro, a small town in the southern part of the State, that claimed exemption from the operation of this law on the ground that they were simply buying grain for their own use and for their own business. They averred that they were not doing a general public elevator business for hire, but that they bought their grain from the farmers, shipped it as their goods to their own consignees, and that they were merely carrying on a private business and were not subject to public control. The Supreme Court of the United States held that they were doing a public business, and that they were amenable to the regulations of the Minnesota railroad and warehouse commission.

The Supreme Court laid down this principle for guidance. It held that this Lanesboro elevator company was occupying the position of a public market place, buying grain from every farmer who came there, grading it and weighing it on their own scales, and that these acts were those of a public business, and that the public had a right to control it.

So it is with the pipe lines. The Standard Oil Company, owning 90 per cent of all the pipe lines of the country, has a large pipe line running through the country, which is fed all along its length by a host of feeders. Private parties build pipe lines to the trunk line to run the oil from their own wells, which are connected with the pipe lines of the Standard Oil Company, which buys the oil from these smaller dealers. The different parties who have these feeding lines from their wells ship their oil to the trunk line, and stand in the same relation to the public that the elevator company does in Minnesota. The United States has as much right to control these interstate pipe lines as the State of Minnesota has to control the private elevator companies.

The Standard Oil Company needs this regulation most. It purchases the oil from the independent shipping oil owners who have built the feeding lines to the great trunk line of the Standard Oil Company. It purchases their oil and refuses to pipe it beyond the point of intersection for the oil owners to a possibly better market beyond. It monopolizes the trunk-line carriage, and is subject to control on the ground that it buys oil from the owners, measuring and grading it in their own way, and therefore occupies the position of a public market subject to public control.

The pipe lines ought to be brought under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Its enormous traffic—the largest in the world—makes it peculiarly appropriate that it should be brought under this control. It has the right of eminent domain and exercises it; it occupies the place of a public market; it has been declared a common carrier by the legislatures of several States; and the company itself, through one of its counsel, has admitted that it is a common carrier in all the territory of the United States east of the Mississippi River; it deals in an article most essential to public use, and by all means it should be regulated and controlled.

The independent refineries of the country try to obtain oil from their own wells, and are sometimes favored by the Standard Oil Company with carriage and at other times refused. In the plain language of the business world, they have the oil business by the throat. When they want to be common carriers, they are all grace and compliments; when they do not want to be, they are all vinegar and negation. If they are common carriers in a part of the country, on their own motion, let them be made common carriers in every part of the country by operation of law. If there is nothing wrong, the law will not hurt them. If everything is as correct as they say it is, and if they are really the public benefactors they claim to be, the regulation will do them no harm. If, on the contrary, there is something wrong—and the clamor of the people would seem to indicate this—then it is high time that the wrong should be corrected by the operation of law. And believing that a wrong exists, I shall vote for this bill, with the pipe-line amendment.

And I am opposed to any change in the verbiage of the bill which shall attempt to except such pipe lines from the operation of the law as do not "transport for hire" or "transport for the public." While the Standard Oil Company does the greatest business, it is not therefore necessary for us to legislate against them alone. The law must be general, and all pipe lines must be treated alike. Such as exercise the right of eminent domain or such as have the place of a public market must be regulated and controlled impartially. All others are beyond our control, as they should be.

The transportation of oil throughout the world is an immense problem. The world's production of petroleum in 1899, according to the report of the United States Geological Survey, approximated 5,000,000,000 gallons, or 100,000,000 barrels, of which the United States produced 2,500,000,000 gallons, or about 50,000,000 barrels. The quantity exported was about 1,200,000,000 gallons in 1905 and brought into the country a value of about $80,000,000, and the export quantity is very little compared with the quantity consumed at home. From the Mineral Industry it appears that the production of crude petroleum in the United States for 1905 was 117,063,000 barrels of 42 gallons each, or about 4,916,000,000 gallons, an amount approximately equal to the world's production in 1899. The figures from the Statistical Abstract of the United States are about the same. These figures show the tremendous value of the business, and explain many other remarkable truths.

Oil has made one man the richest man of the world. In Munsey's Scrap Book for June of this year is a list of the world's richest hundred men. At the head of the list stands the name John D. Rockefeller, with a wealth of $600,000,000, and the information that this money was made in oil. The tenth and eleventh ones on the list are William Rockefeller and H. H. Rogers, each with a wealth, made in oil, of $100,000,000. Henry M. Flagler stands twenty-fourth, with an oil wealth of $60,000,000. John D. Archbold and Oliver Payne come in for $50,000,000 each. The richest oil man of Russia—itself a great oil-producing country and almost equal to the United States—is M. Nobel, with a wealth of $25,000,000. [Applause.]

Six men of the United States have a combined wealth, made in oil, of $960,000,000, and these six men own just one-seventh of all the wealth owned by the 100 richest men in the world. These figures are amazingly large and illustrate the ease with which the master minds of the oil industry become multimillionaires when placed in positions where their monopolistic power may be exercised without control.

The history of Standard Oil is a record of uncontrolled rapacity, and the wealth it has drawn to itself is out of all proportion to the service rendered. Besides these great captains of the oil industry, there are hundreds of smaller men whose recorded wealth reaches the million mark. The interstate commerce necessitated by this industry is immense, and up to this good hour the pipe-line commerce, the greatest part of the trade, has been absolutely without Congressional and almost without State control.

To pipe the oil of the United States requires twenty-eight great pipe lines, nearly all of which are trunk lines. Besides these, there are fourteen local or feeding lines. Twelve of the twenty-eight great lines are in a single system and acknowledge a single control. These twelve lines cover a territory from Oklahoma to the Atlantic and from Tennessee to the Lakes.

Five other great lines form another monopoly, covering West Virginia, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Of the twenty-eight great lines, at least nine cross State lines and will be subject to this law.

Twenty-one States have in one form or another attempted to regulate pipe lines. The right of eminent domain has been granted them in my own State—Kentucky—and in California, Colorado, Indiana, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

In New York and Ohio they are made common carriers by law, and in Pennsylvania by the decision of the courts.

It is very doubtful, however, whether the legislation of these States is effective. From a letter written to me by the president of the Lake Carriers' Oil Company on March 5 of this year it appears that the law is not effective in Pennsylvania. His whole letter is so interesting that I reproduce it entire:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, March 5, 1906.

Hon. JOS. L. RHINOCK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of yours of the 1st instant, with copy of your bill, drafted with a view to making all the pipe lines common carriers.

In reply, we beg to say that such a bill, if effective, would have our hearty indorsement. Our understanding of the matter is, however, that a pipe line may be declared a common carrier and yet refuse to give any practical relief where such may be considered by the pipe-line owners undesirable from their standpoint. I refer to the pipe lines in the State of Pennsylvania. While they, as I understand it, are common carriers by law, yet the act does not compel the pipe lines to deliver generally. In other words, it is held by the pipe-line people that they are compelled by law to deliver only at their nearest station where the crude oil originates, and I know of instances where they have flatly refused to deliver otherwise.

I would like to hear, therefore, from you direct, if you will, as to what is being introduced into your bill, if anything, to provide against this abuse of power of the pipe-line people. Being assured on this point, we shall most willingly render any assistance possible in influencing the passage of your bill in the manner you suggest.

Very truly, yours,

LOFTUS CUDDY, President.

The passage of this bill will make the interstate transportation of oil through pipes effective, and will meet the objections to the operation of State law so clearly outlined by the preceding letter.

Of the pipe lines doing an interstate business, the Standard Oil Company controls 90 per cent of the business and the Pure Oil Company controls the remainder. The United States Pipe Line Company claims to be the pioneer in the pipe-line business, and controls lines extending from Oil City to the Atlantic seaboard and also into West Virginia. In the testimony of Louis Emery, a member of this company, before Messrs. Clements and Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at Cleveland, Ohio, on May 24 of this year, as reported by the Washington Post, he referred to the Standard Oil Company as the "devilfish that never invented anything, but absorbs the best of other men."

The necessity for national legislation is made clear by the following extract from Mr. Emery's testimony. He said:

We are to-day the only independent competitor of the Standard Oil Company to the seaboard, and that is the only way we can transport our oil, for the railroads are controlled completely by the Standard. We have been hounded to death by the Standard. They even tried to buy up our $1,000,000 issue of stock, and we were compelled to put our stock in trust, so that it would not be possible to sell out to this devilfish except by the unanimous consent of all of us.

Mr. Emery was in favor of the bill introduced by me, as will appear from the following extract from a letter to me of date March 16. He said:

EMERY MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Bradford, Pa., March 16, 1906.

Hon. J. L. RHINOCK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your letter inclosing House bill 15438, in which you declare all pipe lines to be common carriers. We are quite largely interested in the transportation of oil by pipe line, and it was through the effort of our people that the first pipe-line bill in Pennsylvania was passed after a sixteen-year trial. Our Mr. Emery has always been in favor of any person or corporation having the right of eminent domain being declared common carriers, whether it be of oil or any other product.

We are in perfect harmony with the President of the United States, and will endeavor to give him every aid possible; and we will give you our untiring support in your effort to make the pipe-line companies of the country common carriers.

With best wishes, I remain, yours, truly,

LOUIS EMERY, Jr.

But is the Standard Oil Company really buying its oil so as to raise the question of private ownership in pipe lines? We think not. They do not own the oil wells, and hold themselves out as oil buyers; but when they buy they do not name a "spot" price and take the oil. They name a "terminal" price, buy the oil on the spot, but deduct transportation charges from the point of intersection to the terminal points. The copies of certificates and receipts presented by Senator LODGE in open Senate on May 4 clearly establish this point.

They were then not transporting their own oil. They were mere carriers of other people's oil at a given rate, the oil becoming theirs at the terminal point.

Well owners have no option. They must pay the transportation charges of the pipe lines or hold their oil. Every small well owner throughout the country is completely at the mercy of the pipe lines. It is a cutthroat business of the worst kind. In fact, all well owners, small and great, are at their mercy, as the following letter from the Columbia Oil Company of New York, to Senator LODGE, and printed in the RECORD on page 6499, clearly shows:

COLUMBIA OIL COMPANY OF NEW YORK,
New York, March 29, 1906.

Senator LODGE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I noticed by the papers that you have proposed an amendment to the railroad rate bill making pipe lines common carriers. Pipe lines should be common carriers whether they are private lines or public lines where they connect with public lines that are common carriers under the law. For your information I give you a short personal sketch of my connection with them. It is as follows:

I am a producer of petroleum in West Virginia and a refiner of petroleum in New York Harbor, and have considerable trouble in procuring a quantity of crude oil sufficient to run our works.

I feel aggrieved at the treatment by the Standard Oil Company, owner of the pipe lines, and the Pure Oil Company, controller of other pipe lines that run in that field. Both companies refuse to deliver to me the oil I produce, and I have to sell it to both at the prices they make.

I understand you are now trying to frame some bill that will put the people on an equality; it will be well for you to know the condition of the business and how both companies have created and keep a monopoly in the business.

Eureka Pipe Line.—This company is owned by the Standard Oil Company. It passes through Ohio and West Virginia. It receives into its line oil that is produced on a lease I own in Wetzel County, W. Va. It takes this oil to United Pipe or National Transit lines and is pumped through that system to Jersey City.

I have made application to the Standard Oil Company for transportation of my oil and offered to pay them the usual gathering and transportation charges. They refuse to deliver me my own oil, and I have to sell it to them at their price, although I am ready to pay a premium of 10 or 20 cents a barrel over the market price and the current transportation rates.

They claim that the Eureka Pipe Line is not a public carrier, that it is a private concern, and is not subject to the laws that regulate public carriers. The National Transit Line is a public carrier, but on account of the receiving or initial lines being a private concern, they need not take the oil and are not amenable to the law as public carriers are.

Pure Oil Company.—The Pure Oil Company has been organized under the New Jersey law as an independent corporation to aid producers and refiners and marketers of petroleum in opposition to the Standard Oil Company. It controls the United States Pipe Line.

United States Pipe Line.—The United States Pipe Line is a trunk line and common carrier. It commences at Marcus Hook, on the Delaware River, and runs through to Oil City, Pa.

The Producers and Refiners' Line is also owned by the Pure Oil Company. It is a limited copartnership under the Pennsylvania law. It commences at Oil City, Pa. (where the United States Pipe Line ends), and runs down through Butler County, Pa., to West Virginia. It gathers the oil in West Virginia and southern Ohio and pumps it through to Oil City, where it connects with the United States Pipe Line Company.

I have petroleum production in Wetzel County, W. Va., that goes into that line. The Pure Oil Company also refuses to deliver me the oil I produce and own, and claim that they are a limited copartnership and not a common carrier. I have to sell it to them at their price, although I need it in my business.

The object of this letter is to show the condition of pipe lines that are owned by private parties or copartnerships and not common carriers that work in connection with other lines that are common carriers.

In my opinion all pipe lines should be common carriers, and any producer of oil anywhere should be at liberty to sell the certificates of their oil to anyone wishing to purchase them, and the oil should be received and delivered to all on equal conditions. This would create an open market and the producers could get all that their product was worth.

Common carriers.—They refuse to deliver the oil to refineries where they want it, and generally deliver it in some out-of-the-way place that will cost more to take it from the point of delivery than it can be brought by rail from the point of production.

Difference in cost between rail and pipe-line rates.—Oil can be handled by pipe lines at about one-tenth what it cost by rail.

The oil monopolies owning pipe lines generally make the outside public do their business by rail, they, through their influence, making rail rates while they do their business by pipe lines.

Marketing crude petroleum.—On account of the interest controlling pipe lines, viz, Standard Oil Company and Pure Oil Company, refusing to receive oil for transportation and deliver it to the owners of the oil it prohibits an open market for crude petroleum. The producer has to sell it to the Standard Oil Company or its agents at the Standard Oil Company's price, and to the Pure Oil Company or the Producers and Refiners' Line—which is owned by the Pure Oil Company—at their price, although the owners of the oil stand ready, and in my case I have offered a premium of 10 cents per barrel plus all transportation and charges for my oil.

This should be looked into by the lawmakers and laws enacted that would put producers and refiners of oil on an equal footing to buy and sell their products.

For your information I inclose a blotter issued by the Pure Oil Company. I have drawn a pen line through it at Oil City. From Oil City to Philadelphia or Marcus Hook the two lines are owned by the United States Pipe Line Company. One line transports refined oil; it is 5 inches in diameter; the other transports crude oil and is 4 inches in diameter.

The Producers and Refiners' line commences at Oil City and runs through to West Virginia. The little red marks show gathering, or field lines.

This crude-oil line is from 2 to 6 inches in diameter, and it transports oil from West Virginia to the United States Pipe Line. It is distributed to the refineries in Oil City, Titusville, Warren, and Bradford.

I have been very active in the organization of the United States Pipe Line Company, in which I am now a director, and also I have been very active in the organization and management of the Pure Oil Company. This concern is entirely independent and in competition with the Standard Oil Company. It, however, is run on lines that make it a close corporation, if not closer than the Standard Oil Company.

Any further information will be cheerfully given by

Yours, respectfully, HUGH KING.

The condition of the Columbia Oil Company is the condition of many others, and it is, to say the least of it, an intolerable condition. It should be remedied, and I am desirous of correcting it at once.

In my own State there is but a single independent refinery of oil and but a single independent pipe line. The president of this company, in a letter of March 6, 1906, said:

GEORGETOWN, KY., March 6, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH L. RHINOCK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 2, inclosing a copy of the bill which you have presented in the House of Representatives, is very interesting to us. We have a pipe line of our own in Kentucky, and, although this line would come under the restrictions you wish to impose, we would feel that your bill is one which we would be willing to support, provided we could be of any material service. As a matter of policy, we should like to know from you if we are to take any active part in regard to this measure, what chances there are of having the present Executive Administration support the bill as presented; also what support you have pledged to aid you in getting a vote during the present session.

We are the only independent refinery in Kentucky and the only independent pipe line. We would appreciate a more detailed account of the present status of the bill, and whether you have some assurances of getting a favorable report by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; also some detailed information of how we might be of service in aiding the bill.

I remain, very sincerely, yours,

RICHMOND LEVERING, President.

The National Refining Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, in a letter of March 3, 1906, takes strong ground in favor of this legislation. This company is associated with the Northern Oil Company, the National Pipe Line Company, and the Peerless Transit Line. The letter is as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, March 3, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH L. RHINOCK,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to thank you for your favor of March 1, referring to bill H. R. 15438, a bill to make pipe-line companies common carriers, and desire to most heartily indorse the bill.

Pipe lines have right of domain the same as railroads. They are built for the transportation of oil, and are one of the forms of public highway for transporting petroleum oil, and a pipe line should be a common carrier the same as any railroad, and the Interstate Commerce Commission should have the same jurisdiction over it.

We wish to further state that we think every independent oil man joins us in urging the passage of the bill, and we will so write to our Congressmen and Senators.

Yours, truly,

THE NATIONAL REFINING CO.

The Cornplanter Refining Company, of Warren, Pa., pronounced the legislation vital, and sent me the following letter:

6972

WARREN, PA., March 2, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH L. RHINOCK,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 1st instant is at hand, and we thank you for the copy of your bill, introduced in the House of Representatives February 22, 1906.

This is of the most vital importance to the independent oil refiners, producers, and dealers, and we trust that it will be successful.

We have commended the same most heartily to the Hon. P. C. KNOX, United States Senator from this State.

If we can assist you with any data or information, we are at your service.

Yours, very respectfully,

CORNPLANTER REFINING CO.
E. E. ALLEN, Treasurer.

From all these considerations, the interests of the people of my State and of the country at large, the interests of the refineries and dealers, I urge the passage of the railroad rate bill as amended with reference to pipe lines. It was my pleasure to vote for the original railroad rate bill, a measure demanded by the business interests as well as by the people of the whole country. It was a good bill, and I am glad to know that it is soon to become a law. I shall vote for it again, but I hope and trust that the Lodge amendment will not be stricken out. It improves the original measure by striking down an additional trust. It is demanded by the people, is in the interest of the people, and I sincerely trust that it will prevail.

In conclusion, I want to say that I hope the conferees will insist upon the Senate amendment which also denies to all monopolies the right to transport and produce products of any kind. If they are in the transportation business, let them engage in that alone, and not use their transportation lines to monopolize oil, coal, or any other necessity. [Applause.] Let us do all in our power to make it possible to light the cabins of the poor with unmonopolized oil, and warm them with unmonopolized coal. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to invite attention to a subject which in my judgment is entitled to deep consideration, and which also, in my judgment and according to my observation, has received of the Congress of the United States practically no consideration whatever.

The object of our fathers in forming this Government was to provide the people with the means of governing themselves. The Government, as we all know, is divided into three branches, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The courts, in a general way of speaking, are courts of law, dealing with civil affairs, criminal courts, and courts of equity. The "judicial power" of the United States under the Constitution was to be lodged and is lodged in the courts created and to be created by the Congress and in the tribunal created by the Constitution, the Supreme Court. There has been a good deal of learning and a good deal of pretense of learning employed by way of disquisitions upon "judicial power," as contradistinguished from "jurisdiction." There may be some shade of distinction between the two, but practically they amount, in the courts created by Congress, to the same thing. No more "judicial power" can extend to a court created by Congress than Congress gives it. That is another way of saying that no more "jurisdiction" can extend to it.

The jurisdiction, or judicial power, of Congress-made courts must necessarily, both as to the matters to be dealt with and the manner of dealing with them, be subject to such limitations as the creative power imposes. As an illustration of what I mean I might refer to legislation when the Constitution was new; the work of legislators many of whom had helped to make the Constitution. The judiciary act of 1789, a glorious monument of legal learning and legislative wisdom, contained an express limitation upon the power of the courts to issue injunctions, making notice indispensable.

Now, if there be original power in the courts when once created by Congress to issue injunctions, subject only to the discretion and after the manner of procedure of the court, acording to the court's own judgment, then this legislation limiting the issuing of injunctions by these courts created by Congress to instances and cases in which notice had been given would clearly be an invasion of the constitutional function and a deprivation of part of the judicial power of the courts.

Notwithstanding that, there is nothing better established in our history than the constitutionality of this legislative limitation upon judicial power, or jurisdiction—whatever you please to call it. This limitation was the law, observed and upheld by the courts, until the Congress, the power that imposed it, legislated it out of existence more than three-quarters of a century after it found a place in the judiciary act of 1789. Whether you say it was a limitation upon jurisdiction or a withholding or withdrawal of something of judicial power, is a matter of fineness in distinction perhaps, but of no substance whatever in fact. The courts could not issue injunctions unless notice were given, because the law said they could not, and the Congress creating them had—and has—the right to pass the law.

In 1831, following the impeachment in the Peck case—a case celebrated in the annals of this country, where a judge from St. Louis was brought before the bar of the Senate on a charge of having abused his power in sentencing an attorney to imprisonment for a short period of time, for contempt, because he had presumed to criticise a deliverance of the court—Congress passed an act providing that in a certain class of contempts there should be no summary punishment by the court.

For that particular class punishment should be adjudged alone, as in the case of crimes in general, upon indictment, trial, and conviction. As to the constitutionality of that act of 1831 there never has been serious question, but whether there has or has not been question, if there ever was any doubt the doubts have been laid, the question has been conclusively determined, for time and time again the Supreme Court has held the act to be constitutional and binding. Who, then, can doubt that the same agency which could and did take from the courts the power to punish some contempts, except upon indictment, trial, and conviction, could further restrain and regulate them and their process and procedure?

Some contend that the judicial power which our Federal courts possess and must have is the identical judicial power which the English courts had at the date of the adoption of our Constitution. That is but another way of saying that while the Congress alone could "ordain and establish" inferior courts, it could not arm one of them with a particle of judicial power beyond the measure of such power possessed by the English courts, or deprive one of them of a particle of such power if possessed by the English courts, according to the claim of the English courts or of the American duplicates.

And yet there is not a syllable in the Constitution that "judicial power" is such power—nothing less, nothing more—as English judges had said or might say English courts had, or American Federal courts might determine that English courts had. Besides, many of the abuses and much of the oppression which drove our ancestors to the new-world wilderness sprang directly out of usurpation of judicial power and arbitrary exercise of judicial power by English courts and judges. It is inconceivable that our fathers were so stupid as to put the courts which Congress might "ordain and establish" not only beyond the legislative power of the government of the people, as they surely meant it should be, but carefully contrived to implant and perpetuate in the judicial system of a free, self-governing people every vice, real or possible to be imputed, in the judicial establishment of a monarchy, as well as those faults developed in or incident to human infirmity or resorted to by a king-made judiciary, in the accomplishment of a king's purposes, often subversive of the rights of a free people.

Again, if the Federal judges were to be omnipotent in determining the extent and character of their own judicial power, as well as the manner of its exercise, why was it that the Constitution gives to each of them a life term, and makes their office appointive instead of elective? There is but one reasonable answer, but one plain path through what but for it would be a labyrinth of absurdities: The Constitution which clothed the Congress with the power to ordain and establish inferior courts did not withhold from it the power to determine from time to time what the creature court should be; what should be within its jurisdiction or judicial power; within what limits and by the employment of what agencies it should accomplish what by the creative power of Congress it was designed to do, in the way chosen by its creator.

New forces and agencies have been developed since our Government came into being—tremendous forces, mighty agencies. The railroad train has superseded the stagecoach, the huge iron ship, driven by steam and electricity, instead of the frail wooden bark dependent upon the wind, now swiftly plows the ocean. The wayside forge has disappeared and the giant steel plants have grown up. The sewing machine does quickly and deftly the tedious work of a million needles. The great power looms have sent to the relic room the housewife's spinning wheel, while her homely hand loom has gone out of the busy world. Scores of millions of dollars are invested and thousands of workmen are employed in each of hundreds of factories, with multiplied machines which do their work with such swiftness and such perfection as in their completeness to approach the excellence of an intelligence and contrivance almost superhuman. Examples of modern marvels in execution as well as in conception might be multiplied almost indefinitely.

Everybody knows that in the course of time, with change of conditions and the springing up of new causes of action—in the wide world of change wrought in the last hundred years by the application of electricity, by the development of mighty moneyed organizations and mighty manufactories and mighty institutions of all kinds—issues unthought of, undreamed of, in the early days have to be dealt with now, and still more strange and difficult questions perhaps will have to be dealt with in the future. That being true, it has become necessary, as a matter of fact, that the powers and processes and methods of procedure of the courts from time to time must undergo some change. How can they, how should they, undergo that change? Is our form of government such that the courts change their own powers and the way of exercising their own powers, and change as to the subjects and objects to which they shall apply them, with the Congress absolutely powerless to work any change at all? Perhaps that question could be answered by a general reference to our scheme of government. The object, as I said at the outset, was to give the people more power, to make a government of the people instead of a government of the few over the people. How can the people exercise their power? Through their law-making bodies chosen by themselves and the Executive of their choice, and through those agencies alone. The people can not exercise that power through the judiciary. The people can not select or remove a Federal judge.

As a matter of fact, we find that there has grown up of recent years, and grown up rapidly, a disposition in courts, carried into action, of reaching out, of extending, of grasping more of jurisdiction or judicial power, of exercising a different and mightier control over important things. That is one of the most insidious and dangerous evils that ever can exist in the government of a free people, if they are to remain free. One judge decides that he has power to do a certain thing and does it. Another judge, having a similar matter submitted to him, extends a little further the power of the court as to substance, or as to the manner and process of exercising power, and relies upon the previous action of his brother judge as authority for the usurpation. A third judge goes still further, extends his grasp and processes of restraint, compulsion, and punishment to things still more distant, relying, of course, upon the usurpations of the other two judges for his authority. Now, can this power go on augmenting indefinitely? Can it continue forever in a Republic like ours, under a Constitution like ours, with no agency anywhere to apply a check, and no power or influence or body anywhere to stand against the steady advance of the lawless law-making judge?

It is notorious that the courts have been making law most steadily and in some instances most perniciously, lo, these many years; and yet some gentlemen insist that Congress can not do anything to unmake judge-made law. Some judges are drunken on the wine of precedent and stare decisis, and in some the almost universal human lust of power is so strong that unconsciously they magnify their offices overmuch. Some have reached the bench through the schools of great corporations. But, lest I be misunderstood, let me say that the judiciary of the land ever has been and still is adorned by great minds, great learning, and great civic virtues. No man exceeds me in reverence for the "just judge," than whom there are none more useful or more highly esteemed.

Passing from these preliminary observations and coming to a subject which I think merits the attention of Congress and of the country, I wish to make a few remarks upon Government By Injunction.

In the early days the writ of injunction was rarely issued. It was confined to comparatively few cases. It was issued with care and thoughtfulness. It was recognized as an extraordinary writ. But we have now arrived at a stage in our governmental affairs when the injunction is one of the most ordinary, everyday, frequently-resorted-to writs known to the judicature of our country or of any country. Now, is there any power in Congress to correct this if it be an evil, to curb the courts in the abuse of this and similar writs, or are we, under the Constitution and our frame of government, absolutely helpless, with uncontrollable power in these lifetime judges to issue just as many extraordinary writs in just as many instances as to them shall seem proper? I believe not. I believe that the Congress can apply a corrective.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us reflect for a moment that for years and years, session after session, Congress after Congress, the representatives of millions of the laboring people of this country have appealed to Congress for legislation to correct the abuses of the courts in the exercise of their assumed powers to issue writs of injunction, writs of prohibition, restraining orders, and similar writs. Time and time again have these appeals fallen upon deaf ears. Is the subject of so slight importance that it ought not to receive consideration? Is it a mere trifling thing, a mere matter of agitation among people who know nothing about what they would have, should have, or are entitled to? Or is it a profound and serious question of statesmanship, a problem sufficient in its far-reaching consequences to deserve the best consideration of the best minds of the Republic? Which is it?

The writ of injunction has come to be used as a means for punishing crime, or certain acts of omission or commission treated as crimes. Let me offer a familiar illustration. Somebody is charged with having "boycotted" somebody else, engaged in some business; maybe for a good reason, maybe for a bad reason; that is immaterial in so far as the principle is concerned. A court of equity is applied to and a restraining order or an injunction is issued to prohibit and end the boycott. Disobedience is contempt, and contempt brings summary punishment, at the will of the judge. Now, then, in another field of activity there is somebody engaged, say, in conducting a business which impinges upon political affairs, or who has to do with political questions, as manager of somebody's campaign, as publisher of some newspaper, as a writer of articles for publication, or as a speechmaker. About him and his acts and his motives anybody who chooses, taking only the risk of an action for damages or the hazard of prosecution in the criminal courts for a violation of the law, can say or publish anything. About a person who may be one's political adversary or whose views may be antagonistic to his own, anything, everything, may be uttered, and, without fear of an injunction, may be spread broadcast over the land by all the means known to the modern art of publication—including pictures, caricatures, and incendiary speeches.

Things may be said which, if believed, would cause the victim to be execrated from one end of the land to the other, as far as defamatory language can reach; and yet no court of equity is called upon to interfere. How soon there may be resort to equity in such cases, if this wild rush for "equitable" power and "equitable" jurisdiction is to continue I know not, but no man now dreams of going into a court of equity and getting a restraining order against anybody who prints caricatures offensive to him, or who publicly charges him with betraying a high trust, of corrupting the fountains of justice, or doing anything else that is regarded among decent men as reprehensible.

But if one is selling goods somewhere, if he is manufacturing something somewhere, or is engaged in any pursuit of the dollar, he may appeal to a court of equity, and blanket injunctions are spread far and wide over the land, restraining a multitude for the benefit of one. Dollars have the protection of the chancellor, while reputation and peace of mind directly involved and other dollars indirectly involved must seek protection in the courts of law, civil or criminal.

The laboring people of this country have become very weary of government by injunction. Often disputes arise between employers and employees as to the merits of which there may be difference of opinion, but whenever the contest becomes somewhat acute the employer can easily hasten to a court of equity, and, upon his own ex parte showing, can have issued an injunction of the most sweeping, far-reaching character, and whoever violates it, according to the judgment of the judge who issued it, not according to any canons of law in the country, not according to the verdict of a jury trying a man upon an indictment for any criminal offense charged, may, according to the will or wish or whim of the judge, have imposed upon him a heavy penalty—imprisonment or fine, or both fine and imprisonment.

The representatives of labor have sought relief through a number of different measures whose passage they have urged. They asked for trial by jury in contempt cases. Again they asked that the requirement of notice, as in the act of 1789, be reenacted. Later and now they ask that what one may do lawfully shall not be deemed unlawful when two or more join in doing it; that the injunction and the restraining order be confined to the protection of property and property rights when the law affords no adequate remedy, and for a definition of property and property rights, so that personal rights shall be dealt with, as of right they should be, by the courts of law and not by means of the injunction. The argument of Mr. T. C. Spelling before the House Committee on the Judiciary presents the laboring men's view with clearness and force.

I would go further and correct the "receiver" abuse. We hear of railroads—thousands of miles of rail and hundreds of millions of property—being in the hands of the court. A receiver, it is said, holds for the court. Often the receiver operates the railroad just as a general manager might do—not for a week, but for years. In fact, the receiver takes the place of the general superintendent and, like him, is really the representative of those interested in the property, and is not the representative of the court, though appointed by the court. Yet any interference with the receiver-by-the-year, or with any operation under him, is rated as a contempt of court, to be punished at the will or whim of the judge. English judges as such did not operate railroads, through receivers or otherwise, when our Constitution was framed. The industry is a new one. Now, have the courts the constitutional power to make laws and orders for it, or does the rightful power to legislate upon the subject abide in Congress? I believe Congress could and should do the legislating.

Measures are smothered in committee. Many things can come up, but the things that peculiarly affect the laboring people of the country, that affect liberty and right, the very principles of the Constitution—these things are left to the tender mercy of an unrestrained judiciary. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

That these laboring people have a right to complain and to feel that they are badly used and shamefully neglected, I wish to proclaim as a matter of my judgment. But somebody says that violence would result and property would be destroyed but for the injunction. In some cases perhaps it would and in some cases it would not be so; but that has nothing to do with the question of whether injunctions ought to issue or ought not to issue; whether the matter should be considered by the House or should not be considered by the House.

I go further in my own individual judgment as to what ought to be done to curb the powers of these courts, usurped and abused powers and not powers granted, than those who represent the laboring men of this country—I would go further than they ask Congress to go. But why not do something, why not at least consider these questions, why not bring them into the open? Shall not the representatives of three or four millions of toiling people of this country have a hearing here? Is other business so pressing, are other interests so mighty, that they can not be heard, or that there can not be opportunity for a vote; that nothing can be done here, while the courts are grinding out injunctions? One step in forbidden territory, one invasion of the rights of the people, is but the foundation and the excuse in the eyes of a great many men who are upon the bench and a justification for others. When is the invasion to end? Will it ever end?

There is to-day no greater usurpation in this country than the usurpation of the judiciary. The wisest men of the olden day foresaw this danger to our system of government; this insidious, never ending, persistent, onward movement in this life-tenure body—so regarded by the wisest men of the olden day—the one continuous source of danger to our system of government and to the liberties of our people.

Now, it is fashionable, when there has been a contest between labor and capital, between employers and employees, when disturbance has arisen and some property may have been destroyed or some violence may have been done, to justify or excuse the issuance of an injunction, without stopping to consider whether injunction is the proper remedy. And yet, there is no real disposition, although something of a sham, pretended disposition, to prevent the swelling of the ranks of labor by persons who are not in sympathy with this Government, and who know not its genius or its spirit. What shall our laboring people do concerning these elements? Shall they take them in? Why, if labor is to be organized it is bound to do it. It can not do anything else. If the undesirable elements are not with organized labor they are used against it. Every low element that you may bring in, no matter from whence, to swell the ranks of labor, is either the foe of intelligent, organized labor, or it must be taken in and be its coadjutor, however unwelcome.

The responsibility for the ills sometimes inflicted on localities by reason of disputes with the lower elements of the laboring population rests not upon labor itself, either organized or unorganized, but upon the agencies that bring in the bad element. As a whole, our laboring people are peaceable and law-abiding, as well as intelligent. To save themselves from the ignorant and the vicious they must do the best they can to prevent the massing of that class against them.

I believe as firmly as I believe anything in the world that one of the greatest movements that ever took place is the movement of organized labor. You can not elevate the laboring man without elevating the common citizenship of the country. The country is great as the masses are great; the country is good as the masses are good. What is the contest between capital and labor? It is the question of division. Has the division been fair?

Gentlemen say that labor has progressed; that wages are better in this than any other country; but how have the millions been piled up? For instance, has there been a fair division between labor in the steel mills and those who own the watered stock of the steel mills? Have the multi-millionaires no more than their share in the division between capital and labor? For my part, I believe it is high time that the man, the citizen, the creature of flesh and blood, should have more consideration; that something better than the dollar should have more of protection against the pliant or weak judge affected with the injunction-issuing habit. [Loud applause.]

The movement that brought about the organization of labor was inevitable. Organization is a necessity. It is also good for the public. If the anti-injunction legislation sought by the representatives of labor can not, according to your view, be given as asked, what excuse can there be for denying all relief? Are the courts to legislate forever against the personal rights of the toilers? Is Congress never to make law to protect these rights from judicial invasion? Is government by injunction to be perpetual?

The laboring men to-day are peacefully fighting the battle of liberty, as in war they fight the battles of the Republic upon the field where cannons roar and bayonets gleam. This contest against the injunction abuse is a contest for personal rights and free government. The Congress, and not the courts, must make our laws, if our liberties are to be preserved. Hunger and cold are allies of capital when it is in a contest against labor. The wants of wife and child are eloquent, if mute, advocates of conciliation and peace. Is it not a shame that all appeals for relief from the abuse of the writ of injunction are here denied? Let us hope that soon, through an awakened sense of justice and enlightened patriotism, labor may have its day, and government by injunction shall pass from us forever and ever. [Loud applause on Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 11 o'clock having arrived, the committee, by order of the House, will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAPRON, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19750, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a resolution of the congregation of Anshel Bialystock Synagogue, of New York City, N. Y., expressing gratitude to both Houses of Congress for the promptness and unanimity with which they adopted the resolution expressing the indignation of the American people at the horrible atrocities committed in Russia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Albany, N. Y., praying for the ratification of the pending treaty between the United States and Santo Domingo; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5223) to reimburse Quong Hong Yick for one case of opium erroneously condemned and sold by the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FLINT, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2621) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6523) to authorize the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to construct a bridge across the Yukon River, in the Territory of Alaska, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ALASKA PACIFIC RAILWAY AND TERMINAL COMPANY.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6522) to authorize the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to construct a railroad trestle across tide and shore lands in Controller Bay, in the Territory of Alaska, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In view of the importance of the passage of the bill at the present session of Congress, I venture to ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Kentucky where this bridge is to be located? In what part of Alaska?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The bill describes it as along tide water, from the mainland to the island designated in the bill, the Senator will notice.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In southwestern Alaska or western Alaska or south Alaska?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask the Senator reporting the bill from the Committee on Commerce to answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BERRY. Another bill provides for the building of a bridge by the same company across the Yukon River. I am not familiar with the geography of that part of Alaska, but already the company has the right to construct a railroad there under the present law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The bill authorizes this work to be done by a railroad company that has complied with the law?

Mr. BERRY. That has complied with the law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And that has secured a right of way under the general law?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes. The bill now under consideration, I will say to the Senator, does not provide for the construction of a bridge, but for a trestle and the approaches to the trestle along this tide water.

Mr. BERRY. Under the present law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK HOLWAY ATKINSON.

Mr. BURROWS. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6463) waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Frank Holway Atkinson to report it favorably without amendment and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It waives the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Frank Holway Atkinson, in consideration of his honorable service in the Navy during the Spanish war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17345) creating a United States district court for China, and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, to report it back with a substitute, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That a court is hereby established, to be called the United States court for China, which shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases and judicial proceedings whereof jurisdiction may now be exercised by United States consuls and ministers by law and by virtue of treaties between the United States and China, except in so far as the said jurisdiction is qualified by section 2 of this act. The said court shall hold sessions at Shanghai, China, and shall also hold sessions at the cities of Canton, Tientsin, and Hankau at stated periods, the dates of such sessions at each city to be announced in such manner as the court shall direct, and a session of the court shall be held in each of these cities at least once annually. It shall be within the power of the judge, upon due notice to the parties in litigation, to open and hold court for the hearing of a special cause at any place permitted by the treaties, and where there is a United States consulate, when, in his judgment, it shall be required by the convenience of witnesses, or by some public interest. The place of sitting of the court shall be in the United States consulate at each of the cities, respectively.

That the seal of the said United States court for China shall be the arms of the United States, engraved on a circular piece of steel of the size of a half dollar, with these words on the margin: "The seal of the United States court for China."

The seal of said court shall be provided at the expense of the United States.

All writs and processes issuing from the said court, and all transcripts, records, copies, jurats, acknowledgments, and other papers requiring certification or to be under seal, may be authenticated by said seal, and shall be signed by the clerk of said court. All processes issued from the said court shall bear test from the day of such issue.

SEC. 2. The consuls of the United States in the cities of China to which they are respectively accredited shall have the same jurisdiction as they now possess in civil cases where the sum or value of the property involved in the controversy does not exceed $500 United States money and in criminal cases where the punishment for the offense charged can not exceed by law $100 fine or sixty days' imprisonment, or both, and shall have power to arrest, examine, and discharge accused persons or commit them to the said court. From all final judgments of the consular court either party shall have the right of appeal to the United States court for China: Provided also, That appeal may be taken to the United States court for China from any final judgment of the consular courts of the United States in Korea so long as the rights of extraterritoriality shall obtain in favor of the United States.

SEC. 3. That appeals shall lie from all final judgments or decrees of said court to the United States circuit court of appeals of the ninth judicial circuit, and thence appeals and writs of error may be taken from the judgments or decrees of the said circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same class of cases as those in which appeals and writs of error are permitted to judgments of said court of appeals in cases coming from district and circuit courts of the United States. Said appeals or writs of error shall be regulated by the procedure governing appeals within the United States from the district courts to the circuit courts of appeal, and from the circuit courts of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, respectively, so far as the same shall be applicable; and said courts are hereby empowered to hear and determine appeals and writs of error so taken.

SEC. 4. The jurisdiction of said United States court, both original and on appeal, in civil and criminal matters, and also the jurisdiction of the consular courts in China, shall in all cases be exercised in conformity with said treaties and the laws of the United States now in force in reference to the American consular courts in China; and all judgments and decisions of said consular courts, and all decisions, judgments, and decrees of said United States court shall be enforced in accordance with said treaties and laws. But in all such cases when such laws are deficient in the provisions necessary to give jurisdiction or to furnish suitable remedies, the common law and the law as established by the decisions of the courts of the United States shall be applied by said court in its decisions and shall govern the same subject to the terms of any treaties between the United States and China.

SEC. 5. That the procedure of the said court shall be in accordance, so far as practicable, with the existing procedure prescribed for consular courts in China in accordance with section 4086 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: Provided, however, That the judge of the said United States court for China shall have authority from time to time to modify and supplement said rules of procedure. The provisions of sections 4106 and 4107 of the Revised Statutes of the United States allowing consuls in certain cases to summon associates shall have no application to said court.

SEC. 6. There shall be a district attorney, a marshal, and a clerk of said court, with authority possessed by the corresponding officers of the district courts in the United States as far as may be consistent with the conditions of the laws of the United States and said treaties. The judge of said court and the district attorney, who shall be lawyers of good standing and experience, marshal, and clerk shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive as salary, respectively, the sums of $8,000 per annum for said judge, $4,000 per annum for said district attorney, $3,000 per annum for said marshal, and $3,000 per annum for said clerk. The judge of the said court and the district attorney shall, when the sessions of the court are held at other cities than Shanghai, receive in addition to their salaries their necessary expenses during such sessions not to exceed $10 per day for the judge and $5 per day for the district attorney.

SEC. 7. The tenure of office of the judge of said court shall be ten years, unless sooner removed by the President for cause; the tenure of office of the other officials of the court shall be at the pleasure of the President.

SEC. 8. The marshal and the clerk of said court shall be required to furnish bond for the faithful performance of their duties, in sums and with sureties to be fixed and approved by the judge of the court. They shall each appoint, with the written approval of the said judge, deputies at Canton and Tientsin, who shall also be required to furnish bonds for the faithful performance of their duties, which bonds shall be subject, both as to form and sufficiency of the sureties, to the approval of the said judge. Such deputies shall receive compensation at the rate of $5 for each day the sessions of the court are held at their respective cities. The office of marshal in China now existing in pursuance of section 4111 of the Revised Statutes is hereby abolished.

SEC. 9. The tariff of fees of said officers of the court shall be the same as the tariff already fixed for the consular courts in China, subject to amendment from time to time by order of the President, and all fees so taxed and received shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I observe that an appeal lies to the circuit court of appeals. What circuit?

Mr. SPOONER. The ninth circuit.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act creating a United States court for China, and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof."

COSTA RICAN DEBT.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in some remarks I made the other day on the information that I submitted to the Senate in regard to the Costa Rican debt I made a statement which included the fact, as I supposed it to be, that Costa Rica had coincided and agreed to the propositions that were submitted by Speyer & Co., of New York, and other persons connected with the negotiation about the refunding of the debt of Costa Rica. It seems that I was in error about it, and I desire now to ask that the Secretary read a letter from Señor Calvo, who is minister from Costa Rica to this country, and that it may go into the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none; and the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

LEGACION DE COSTA RICA,
Washington, D. C., June 25 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORGAN: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday, June 23, 1906, volume 40, page 9310 of number 157, I have read your statement in regard to certain foreign debts, and I deem it convenient to say, in reference to that of Costa Rica, that if it is true that a contract was signed for a conversion of the foreign debt, the unification of the same with the domestic debt, and the negotiation of a loan, this contract was signed at referendum and has never been accepted nor in any way approved by the Government of Costa Rica. On the contrary, it was immediately rejected by the Executive and never submitted to Congress for its ratification. It has been so publicly declared, as it can be seen by the message of the President of the Republic at the opening of the present session of the National Congress, May 1, 1906.

With best regards, I am, my dear Senator MORGAN,
Very respectfully, yours, J. B. CALVO.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say just a word further. I am very happy to lay that letter of Mr. Calvo before the Senate of the United States and to express my admiration of the self-respect that the Costa Rican Government has manifested in the rejection of this proposition. I did not know until he informed me of it that the proposition had been so summarily rejected by that Government.

Costa Rica has set an example in this matter to the other smaller Spanish-American republics worthy of all acceptance, and I hope that it will be their steadfast purpose to follow that example in regard to their public debts, and that the United States will not be involved in it in any respect or under any consideration.

LANDS AT DURANGO, COLO., FOR WATER RESERVOIRS.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] be relieved from further service as a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 2128) granting to the city of Durango, in the State of Colorado, certain lands therein described for water reservoirs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Colorado is excused.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the Chair appoint a conferee in place of the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will appoint the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRICES OF BEEF CATTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I submit a statement showing the range of prices of different grades of cattle in the Chicago market from May 17 to June 16, 1906, inclusive, and a similar table showing the range of prices in Omaha, Kansas City, St. Louis, and St. Joseph during the same period. I think it very important to have these tables published at this time for the benefit of the conferees on the agricultural appropriation bill, and I ask that the tables be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO LIVE STOCK, ETC.

Mr. WARREN. Pursuant to the notice given yesterday, I should like to call up from the table Senate resolution 156.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming calls up a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WARREN on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor cause to be made by the Bureau of Census, and to present the same to the Senate, a statement compiled from the most recent census returns, showing the number and value of cattle, sheep, horses, and swine in the United States; the number and value exported; the number and value imported; the number of persons employed in the slaughtering of live stock and the preparation of meat products and the amount of wages paid them; the amount of duty collected from imports of live stock for the most recent year for which such statistics have been collected.

Also a statement of the statistics of hides and leather, tanned, curried, and finished; the number and value of boots and shoes manufactured in the United States; the number and value exported; the number and value imported; the number of persons employed in the manufacture of leather products, including boots and shoes, and the amount of wages paid them; the amount of duty collected from imports of leather products, including boots and shoes, and the value of hides and leather admitted free of duty and the value of hides and leather admitted upon which duty is paid, and the amount of the same, for the most recent year for which statistics have been collected.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. There is so much noise in the Chamber it was impossible to hear the Secretary reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HALE. I could not gather what is the scope of the resolution. It seemed to me as if it was a general provision for taking statistics which would be almost as broad as a new census. I do not know that that is so. I wish——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I can give the Senator the information he wants, and he may not desire to have the resolution again read.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. The resolution is one which I do not expect to secure the passage of at the present time. I wish to submit some remarks upon it, and then if the Senator has any objection to it it can go over or it can be referred to a committee.

Mr. HALE. Then I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. WARREN. That will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. HALE. That is entirely satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming will proceed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, Congress has had much to do, and the press of the country and the people much to say of late, about live stock and the products and manufactures therefrom.

The newspapers and public men of certain States have aggressively demanded "free raw material"—so called, erroneously—such as free wool, free hides, free coal for manufacturing same, etc.; and the excitement in one State at one time reached a point where a candidate for governor was in wide difference through the public press with the President of the United States as to sentiments entertained and expressed upon this subject.

Still later, from the White House and by Executive direction has followed an inspection of certain features of the live-stock industry, the result of which has surprised the nation.

Hence it is that I am moved to ask for still further light, that we may know the extent of the interests for which we are called upon to legislate.

CURRENT INFORMATION WILL ASTONISH THE SENATE.

The information called for by the resolution just presented will, I believe, astonish the Senate, as it will, when received, show statistics and details of magnitude almost beyond comprehension.

The Twelfth Census reports, covering a period of collection and compilation of over six years ago, indicated that the live-stock industry, even at that time, was the largest of all the industries in the United States, and a statement of the industry as it exists to-day would show that it maintains its supremacy and is deserving of the most careful and important consideration by Congress and the American people.

The Twelfth Census gave the results of its compilation of live stock for 1899, and the figures, although stupendous, did not, I believe, fully represent this mammoth industry for that year, and since that time, in the seven years following, increases in some of the lines have been phenomenal.

In the United States, in 1899, the Bureau reported:

Domestic animals, value, $2,981,722,945.

	Number.	Value.
Neat cattle	67,822,336	$1,476,499,714
Horses	18,280,007	896,935,343
Mules	3,271,121	196,812,560
Sheep	61,605,811	170,337,022
Swine	62,876,108	232,027,707
Goats	1,871,252	3,266,080

Sales of live animals in 1899 for slaughter brought $722,913,114.

Animals slaughtered on farms brought $189,873,310.

The number of persons engaged in the live-stock and interdependent industries at that time was:

In agricultural pursuits	10,381,765
Stock raisers, herders, etc	169,976
Butchers	113,193
Meat packers	13,776
Leather and its products	557,401
Candle, soap, and tallow makers	4,020

A total of 11,240,131 persons, whose livelihood was dependent directly and indirectly on the live-stock industry, or 38 per cent of our entire working population.

INCIDENTAL BRANCH OF LIVE-STOCK BUSINESS IS GREATEST OF OUR INDUSTRIES.

The incidental branch of the live-stock industry, that of slaughtering and meat packing, not including retail butchering, ranks No. 1 in all of our industries in value of net products, the value in 1899 being $684,119,221. The present year it will reach $1,000,000,000. It ranked No. 17 in the number of wage-earners, this number being 69,441; No. 15 in rank in value of wages, the amount being $33,923,253; No. 10 in amount of capital employed, this being $190,706,927. When the interdependent industries connected with the live-stock industry are combined with it this industry takes first rank with all of the industries of the United States in value of products, amount of wages paid, and capital employed.

And so, to adequately present to the Senate the importance of this industry and to bring us up to date, I ask the adoption of my resolution.

Of all that has been spoken or written concerning our great industries, the least has been said of the largest. I doubt if one person in ten would be able to tell offhand what our greatest industry is and give even approximately its annual value. Some would say our iron and steel production, with its more than $1,000,000,000 worth of yearly output. Others would say our textile industry is the largest; and yet our woolen, cotton, silk, and linen goods combined do not equal our iron and steel products. Others would perhaps say our mineral products, which in 1904 amounted in value to $1,289,000,000. Some might think our building industry the greatest. Some would no doubt say our lumber and timber products, and others our flouring and grist mill products. Some might say our freight traffic or total railroad earnings of about $2,000,000,000. But they would all be wrong, for, as I have already indicated, the one branch of industry under consideration is greater than any of the others I have named, and it far exceeds any other single agricultural or manufacturing pursuit in which our people are engaged.

Of course, I refer to the raising, slaughtering, and distribution of animals and animal products. That it may be seen how this compares with other great industries, I present the following table of figures taken from the census of 1900:

Value of products, census of 1900.

Carpentering	$316,101,758
Clothing (men's)	159,339,539
Cotton goods	339,200,320
Flouring and grist mill	501,396,304
Foundry and machine shop	644,990,999
Iron and steel	596,689,284
Lumber and timber	555,197,275
Printing and publishing	347,055,050
Woolen and worsted goods	296,990,484
Slaughtering and meat packing (not including retail butchering)	785,562,413

In 1905 the census returns show the value of products of slaughtering and meat packing alone, and not including retail butchering, to have reached the enormous sum of $913,914,624. But in addition there were 113,193 butchers engaged in retail butchering to a greater or less extent, whose products would swell the above figures to at least $1,500,000,000, for it must be remembered that the great packers reship about 40 per cent of their live stock. Then there are about 6,000,000 farmers whose product, if each slaughtered only $100 a year on the average, would amount to $600,000,000. So that it is a very conservative and low estimate to say that the annual product of our animal industry exceeds $2,000,000,000 in value.

This is many times the value of all the gold produced in the world in 1903, the last year we have full figures for. It is nearly as much as all the gold produced in the United States during the whole history. An industry of such magnitude and value is, I maintain, well worth developing, well worth preserving, well worth protecting.

RELATION OF RAW MATERIAL TO FINISHED PRODUCT.

Let me at this point call attention to the most significant feature of this industry, namely, the value of the so-called raw material. The cost of material used in the iron and steel production of 1900 was $390,563,117; in the foundry and machine-shop products, $286,357,107; in cotton goods, $176,551,527, and in other great industries the cost of material runs from less than one-half to about three-quarters of the value of the finished product, while in the slaughtering and packing industry the cost of raw material in 1900 was $683,583,577, or about seven-eighths of the value of the final product.

It is chiefly of this material that I shall speak to-day, and I propose, Mr. President, to confine myself for the most part, in the brief remarks I shall make, to one branch of the great industry, namely, cattle and cattle raising.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

Much attention has been given in the past to our sheep and wool industry. It has been attacked by free-traders and defended by protectionists. We have tried free wool and seen our flocks disastrously shrink in number and value.

Let me make but a single comparison. In 1893 our sheep numbered 47,273,553 and were worth $125,909,264. In 1897, after more than two years of free wool, our sheep numbered only 36,818,643 and were worth only $67,020,942, or but a little more than one-half their value of the four years previous. On January 1 of this year, under protection, in spite of the great demand for lamb and mutton, we had 50,631,619 sheep, and their value was $179,056,144, or nearly three times their worth under a free-wool tariff. These figures illustrate, Mr. President, what free trade and protection have done for one branch of our animal industry. The lesson of free wool, so recently learned and so well learned, will, I believe, keep us from any danger of free wool again, for a generation at least, and I may dismiss the subject with the brief allusion I have made. Nor shall I concern myself with our hogs and hog product, important and enormous as it is, nor with our mutton output, great and fast growing as it is, but I will devote my few remarks to cattle products and by-products which are the objects of the latest free-trade attacks, as well as the cause of the great meat-inspection upheaval now on.

VALUE OF FARM ANIMALS UNDER FREE TRADE AND TARIFF.

On January 1 of this year our farm animals were valued at $3,675,389,442, as compared with a valuation of $1,655,414,612 on January 1, 1897, the last year of the Gorman-Wilson tariff. Let me now give the figures for several years showing the number and value of milch cows, oxen, and other cattle. They are taken from the Statistical Abstract, as follows:

January 1—	Oxen and other cattle.		Milch cows.
	Number.	Value.	Number.	Value.
1890	36,849,024	$560,625,137	15,952,883	$353,152,133
1891	36,875,648	544,127,908	16,019,591	346,397,900
1892	37,651,239	570,749,155	16,416,351	351,378,132
1893	35,954,196	547,882,204	16,424,087	357,299,785
1894	36,608,168	536,789,747	16,487,400	358,998,661
1895	34,364,216	482,999,129	16,504,629	362,601,729
1896	32,085,409	508,928,416	16,137,586	363,955,545
1897	30,508,408	507,929,421	15,941,727	369,239,993
1898	29,264,197	612,296,634	15,840,886	434,813,826
1899	27,904,225	637,961,135	15,990,115	474,233,925
1900	27,610,054	689,486,260	16,202,360	514,812,106
1901	45,500,213	906,644,003	16,833,657	505,093,077
1902	44,727,797	839,126,073	16,696,802	488,130,424
1903	44,659,206	824,054,902	17,105,227	516,711,914
1904	43,629,498	712,178,134	17,419,817	508,811,489
1905	43,669,443	661,571,308	17,572,464	482,272,203
1906	47,067,656	746,171,709	19,793,866	582,788,592

It will be seen that the cattle of January 1, 1897, numbered 46,450,135, while on January 1 last they numbered 66,861,522, a gain of 44 per cent. The value of these cattle was $877,169,414 on January 1, 1897, and $1,328,860,311 on January 1, 1906, a gain of 51 per cent. The average under the Wilson-Gorman tariff was about $860,000,000, while the average value under the Dingley tariff has been $1,237,000,000.

Coming now to the cattle slaughtered, I will give the number received at five western markets during 1895 under the Wilson-Gorman tariff, and 1905 under the Dingley tariff.

Number of cattle received at markets named.

	1895.	1905.
Chicago	2,588,558	3,410,469
Kansas City	1,613,454	2,180,491
Omaha	586,103	1,026,392
St. Louis	851,275	1,254,236
St. Joseph	49,203	501,200
Total	5,688,593	8,372,788

A gain of 47 per cent.

It is probable that this gain per cent was fully maintained at the many smaller markets throughout the country, and as the gain in value was much greater than the gain in number, the cattle raiser has been doubly benefited under our present tariff law.

WE SHOULD NOT LOWER THE PRESENT TARIFF ON CATTLE.

I wish now, Mr. President, to give the paragraph of our present tariff law affecting cattle. It is as follows, being paragraph 218 of Schedule G:

218. Cattle, if less than 1 year old, $2 per head; all other cattle, if valued at not more than $14 per head, $3.75 per head; if valued at more than $14 per head, 27½ per cent ad valorem.

Animals imported for breeding purposes and for exhibition are admitted free under certain conditions.

All live-stock animals were dutiable at 20 per cent ad valorem under the Wilson-Gorman tariff. Under the McKinley law of 1890, cattle more than 1 year old were dutiable at $10 per head; 1 year old or less, $2 per head. The present duty on cattle, Mr. President, is none too large for the protection of our farmers and cattle growers. The plea is made that the duty only benefits the so-called "meat trust," and enables the packers to control the price of meat, which we know is greater than it was ten years ago. I do not propose to either condemn or defend the so-called "meat trust." I simply want to assert that the duty has nothing to do with the retail price of meat, save in so far as our tariff, in giving more employment and more wages to consumers, creates a demand for meat far in excess of previous years and far in excess of the demands of any other people. I have shown that the value of cattle has increased over 50 per cent since the Wilson-Gorman tariff.

That is the price which the farmer and cattle grower received, and yet Dun's index prices of all meats were only 8.426 cents per pound of meat on January 1, 1906, as compared with 8.359 cents per pound on January 1, 1895, a very insignificant increase. Moreover, Mr. President, meat in the United States, under protection, is less in price than in Great Britain under free trade. Beef, according to the prices furnished by the New York Produce Exchange, was 20 to 25 per cent higher during 1905 than during 1895. But corn and hay and labor were more than 25 per cent higher. If the packers do control prices, and if they could import cattle from Mexico, Canada, and other countries duty free, then who would benefit? We would have to pay the same price for beef, and the packers would pocket the difference. They would then compel our farmers and cattle growers to meet the foreign price, depressing the domestic industry, reducing cattle prices, and then hold us at their mercy as regards prices for retail consumption.

SOME EXPERIENCES UNDER WILSON-GORMAN ACT.

In this connection I want to give you our experience under the Wilson-Gorman tariff. Under the tariff of 1890, known as the "McKinley law," the duty of $10 per head on cattle over a year old was practically prohibitive. With the repeal of that law and the reduction to 20 per cent ad valorem under the tariff of 1894 importations of cattle were resumed. Let me give you a few sentences from the testimony of Representatives Noonan, of Texas, before the Ways and Means Committee of the Fifty-fourth Congress, January 5, 1897:

The present tariff has practically placed horses, cattle, sheep, and goats on the free list, and it has resulted in great loss to the breeders of stock, many of whom have been bankrupted. Numerous ranches have been abandoned or have gone into decay, and millions of acres of good grazing lands are unused and the grass wasted because the business does not justify stockmen in raising animals for market at present rates. As a consequence all of their industries are languishing from the effects of Mexican competition. Nearly half a million of cattle have been imported from Mexico into the United States through Texas ports since the repeal of the McKinley law. The ranchmen of Texas are unable to sell their stock at the price paid for the Mexican cattle. Texas cattle raisers are required to rent or buy land upon which to graze their cattle, and they are obliged to pay more than double the wages paid in Mexico. Hence citizens of Texas are almost a unit against the importation of these Mexican cattle. At least 95 per cent of the cattlemen in Texas are opposed to the present duty and are in favor of the restoration of the McKinley rate. The tariff once restored—a specific tariff and one sufficient to protect their interests—the old abandoned ranches will at once be reoccupied and our people will again be remunerated for their expenditure and labor, and the prosperity they have yearned for will return.

Placing hides on the free list in 1872 has caused great complaints among stockmen. They claim it was akin to confiscation; that it was a forced loan to benefit leather makers. It diminishes the value of every head of neat cattle in the United States at least $1 per head without any benefit whatever to the consumers of leather. Texas stockmen felt most sensibly the damage to their interests, as it affected the price of cattle raised by them for market. Therefore they expect a restoration of the tariff on hides of at least 10 per cent.

The California delegation submitted the following:

Under the last year of the McKinley tariff only 3,098 cattle came into this country, while under the first year of the Wilson bill there were 217,212 head of cattle brought into the United States. California is largely engaged in the cattle business, and our information is that the business is much injured by the new tariff. Beef cattle bring on an average about $10 per head less, and without any reduction in price to the consumer.

In our opinion, the importation of cattle from Mexico under the present tariff is destroying the cattle business in California.

IMPORTED CATTLE UNDER TWO TARIFF LAWS.

Representative CURTIS, of Kansas, spoke of a trip through his State, saying:

I took particular occasion every place I went to refer to the large importation of Mexican cattle and to find the feeling in the neighborhood in reference to having the duty restored on cattle, and I found the sentiment was almost unanimous, and I never met but one man who said he was benefited by the importation of these cattle. For four years under the McKinley law we only imported 19,000 head of cattle, and we have imported about 367,000 under the Gorman-Wilson law up to October, 1896; and I want to say that the consumers of beef—not one of them has been benefited a penny by this large increase in the importation of Mexican cattle, but they have been fed poorer beef than ever before. If you restore the duty upon cattle, the cattle raisers of Kansas will take the responsibility of furnishing their share of the cattle to supply the markets of this country.

FARMERS AND CATTLEMEN WANT PROTECTION.

I need not augment this testimony, Mr. President. Our farmers and cattle raisers want protection for their product, and we should be wronging every one of our agriculturists and those depending on them by lowering the present duty. The benefit is far reaching, as can be seen by the fact that of the 325,000,000 bushels of corn produced in Nebraska in 1905, half of it was fed to cattle; the same ratio undoubtedly holding good for Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and other sections.

The tariff on cattle protects and benefits nearly one-half of our people as producers or dependents, and it does not affect the price of meat to the consumer. As to the duty of 2 cents on meat, it, too, has little or no effect on the retail price. If it did have, the price of beef or pork or mutton would not be 2 cents per pound more than if no duty existed, while it is well known that the price of certain meats has advanced in recent years more than that amount. The price of meat will be governed by the price of cattle, and their price will be governed by the cost of feed and labor in raising, and in every case the farmer or cattle grower will benefit, as he should benefit.

FINISHED PRODUCT OF OTHER INDUSTRIES PROTECTED.

Let me now briefly explain why he should benefit and why this branch of his industry should be protected. In the first place, the finished products of other great industries, of which his finished product is the raw material, has greater protection, larger duties, than his own. It is estimated that of 1,000 pounds of live stock, 550 pounds become dressed beef, leaving 450 pounds of nonedible material. This latter is converted into so-called "by-products," the science of converting which has made such progress that there is to-day practically no waste whatever of this 450 pounds of nonedible material, but, instead, 120 different products, all more or less valuable, are secured. So important and interesting is this phase of the subject, that I wish to quote the following from a recent article:

Once the 450 pounds of nonedible material was largely thrown away, although the hide and tallow were utilized. Later, some of the waste products were used in the manufacture of glue. Nitrogen being the chief element in plant food, and this being abundant in the great mass of refuse matter originally thrown away as hopeless waste from all the packer's processes, a most important economic advance was made in the step which turned this large volume of scrappage into fertilizer.

It is good sense and for the best interest of the world that all material not needed to feed, clothe, and heal the world should be returned to the ground for food for plants, to grow more grain, to feed more cattle, and to feed more people. That is the circle completed by the packer.

All the cunning of the chemist has been called into service to save, to make the most of every scrap of material in the land, and to discover new ways in which some elements of waste may be diverted from uselessness to use. Hundreds of valuable products are now made and shipped all over the world from materials which under old methods had little or no value. Thousands of people are employed in manufacturing these products. The technical schools are constantly being called upon for young men to aid in solving new problems in by-product utilization. New plants are being built requiring material, machinery, and labor in construction. Success in by-product utilization in the packing industry has directed the attention of other industries in this important element in industrial administration.

All this directly affects the people and has been of great benefit to them. The investigator in medicinal and other lines is constantly calling upon the packer for material to aid him in his work. In the pharmaceutical line much has been done of benefit, and many ills are helped by pharmaceutical preparations of animal origin. In the fertilizing line many sections are given over to growing products which could not be profitably grown without the use of fertilizers. The upland-cotton section of the South has been made by the use of fertilizer in the growing of cotton. Sandy soils in sections climatically favorable have been developed into large truck-farming districts through the use of fertilizers, as the soil without fertilizers is practically sterile.

The furniture of the country is glued with the packers' glue. A great deal of wool used in clothing is from the sheep slaughtered by the packers. One of the largest sources of curled hair is the switch from the tails of cattle. A large portion of the soap manufactured comes from the tallows and greases prepared by the packers. The colors in the summer prints worn by women are largely fixed by the use of albumen prepared by the packers, as is also the finish on many of the fine leathers. The horn comb, hairpins, and buttons are made from the horns of steers. The knife handle, the bone button, and many other articles are made from hard bone of cattle.

Researches by scientists of the first class are employed every day by physicians, surgeons, dentists, and chemists throughout the world. More than thirty recognized therapeutics agents of animal origin are produced in Armour & Co.'s laboratory. Among them are the pepsin and pancreatin that physicians use in treating digestive disorders. There is a product of the thyroid glands that is employed in treating cretinism or idiocy. Another is suprarenalin, used in the most delicate surgical operations to stop the flow of blood. To illustrate how closely the by-product feature of the business is gleaned, the suprarenal glands of more than 100,000 sheep are required to produce 1 pound of suprarenalin, and when produced this suprarenalin is worth more than $5,000 a pound.

Certain by-products of the packing plants are used for hardening and for coloring steel. In fact, materials of animal origin, the result of by-product utilization, enter into the manufacture of almost every article extensively.

BY-PRODUCTS ARE PROTECTED.

Most of these by-products are protected, and the farmer and cattle grower buy them back and consume them more largely than any other class of people. It is fair and equitable to them that they should have a compensating duty on their own products. I will endeavor to illustrate this fully in the case of the principal by-product of cattle—hides.

SHALL HIDES BE FREE OR PAY A DUTY AS NOW?

There was no duty on hides until 1842, when a tariff of 5 per cent was imposed. This duty remained until 1857, when it was reduced to 4 per cent. March 2, 1861, it was put again at 5 per cent, and August 5, 1861, was increased to 10 per cent, where it remained until May, 1872, when hides were again put on the free list, where they remained until the present Dingley law, which went into operation July 24, 1897, when the following duty was imposed, it being paragraph 437:

437. Hides of cattle, raw and uncured, whether dry, salted, or pickled, 15 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That upon all leather exported, made from imported hides, there shall be allowed a drawback equal to the amount of the duty paid on such hides, to be paid under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Let me at this point also give the paragraphs relating to the duty on leather and boots and shoes. They are as follows:

438. Band or belting leather, sole leather, dressed upper, and all other leather, calfskins, tanned or tanned and dressed kangaroo, sheep and goat skins (including lamb and kid skins), dressed and finished, chamois, and other skins, and bookbinders' calfskins, all the foregoing not specially provided for in this act, 20 per cent ad valorem; skins for morocco, tanned, but unfinished, 10 per cent ad valorem; patent, japanned, varnished, or enameled leather weighing not over 10 pounds per dozen hides, or skins, 30 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem; if weighing over 10 pounds and not over 25 pounds per dozen, 30 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem; if weighing over 25 pounds per dozen, 20 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem; pianoforte leather and pianoforte action leather, 35 per cent ad valorem; leather shoe laces, finished or unfinished, 50 cents per gross pairs and 20 per cent ad valorem; boots and shoes made of leather, 25 per cent ad valorem: Provided, That leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms, suitable for conversion into manufactured articles, shall be classified as manufactures of leather and pay duty accordingly.

447. Harness, saddles, and saddlery, or parts of either, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, 45 per cent ad valorem.

450. Manufactures of leather, finished or unfinished, * * * not specifically provided for in this act, 35 per cent ad valorem.

COMPENSATORY DUTY PROTECTS THE MANUFACTURER.

Thus we see, Mr. President, that the present law provides for an equitable and compensating duty on both raw material and finished product. The consumer of the cattle product, hides and leather, has a protective duty on his product, boots and shoes, while the farmer and cattle grower who buys boots and shoes and other leather products have a protective duty on their product which furnishes the material. This is as it should be. The wool grower and manufacturer have compensating duties; the miner and iron and steel manufacturer have compensating duties, and so on through all our industries. All are protected; the farmer, the ranger, the forester, the miner, the fisherman, the manufacturer, and the employee all benefit from protection against the low-paid foreigner. Our present tariff is the most

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question in that connection. He has spoken of the duty on boots and shoes. I wish to understand the Senator's position correctly. Suppose the duty on boots and shoes were removed, would the cattle raisers, the farmers, who are interested in the duty on hides, then consent to a removal of the duty on hides?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I am aware that is a matter of opinion.

Mr. WARREN. The farmers and stockmen, in my opinion, are not seeking for a removal of the tariff on leather or on boots and shoes; they stand for that tariff, as well as for the tariff on hides.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Wyoming spoke of that as a compensating duty, which, of course, it is.

Mr. WARREN. I maintain that, of course.

Mr. LODGE. What I wanted to get at was whether the Senator felt that if one tariff was removed the other should also be removed?

Mr. WARREN. I intend to come to that, Mr. President, but I will now answer the Senator from Massachusetts in a word by saying that I do not believe in removing either one. But if the tariff on hides is removed we must, as a matter of course, remove the tariff on leather and boots and shoes. This would be only simple justice. Our present tariff is the most just law ever in operation, and it is probably more perfect and equitable than any law that could be framed at present to take its place.

To be sure all are not satisfied and never would be under any tariff. Some of the manufacturers of boots and shoes are particularly insistent upon a repeal of the duty on hides. And yet they never were so busy or so prosperous as they have been under the operation of the present tariff. I wish to give the figures showing our exports of cattle, leather, and boots and shoes for the two years 1895 and 1905, the former under free trade, the latter under dutiable hides of cattle.

Exports of cattle, boots, shoes, and leather.

Article.	1895.	1905.

UNITED STATES EXPORT OF BOOTS AND SHOES INCREASED 500 PER CENT.

It will be seen that our exports of cattle increased about 25 per cent; our exports of all leathers and manufactures of about 150 per cent, and our exports of boots and shoes over 500 per cent in number and 700 per cent in value.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is that since the Dingley law went into effect?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; for the ten years from 1895 to 1905 the exports of boots and shoes increased over 500 per cent, including, of course, the nine years since the 15 per cent ad valorem tariff was imposed upon cattle hides.

MORE MARKETS OPEN.

And the foreign field for markets for American-made boots and shoes is by no means exhausted, and in this connection I ask leave to insert a brief extract from a report made by Special Agent Harry R. Burrill, of the Bureau of Manufactures, Department of Commerce and Labor, on "Shoes in China."

OPEN DOOR FOR AMERICAN ENTERPRISE.

Special Agent Harry R. Burrill furnishes a report on foot wear in China which should be given careful consideration by manufacturers of shoes in the United States. The styles of shoes worn by the Chinese, the materials of which made, and methods of manufacture are described in detail, and the opinion is expressed that the Chinese styles can be produced in the United States and sold in successful competition with the handmade product of the natives. The prospective value of the market can not be estimated with any degree of accuracy. It is estimated that the lower classes expend about $1.50 American money per capita per annum for shoes, while the expenditure of the upper clasess varies from $3 to $10 per annum. With a population of 400,000,000 it will be seen that China presents an inviting field for effort on the part of our manufacturers. Samples of the shoes described by Special Agent Burrill are in possession of the Bureau of Manufactures, and will be loaned to manufacturers in the order of application. Mr. Burrill's report follows:

"The expenditure for the native-made boots and shoes of China reaches enormous proportions annually, but as yet there has apparently been no systematic effort on the part of foreign manufacturers to enter the field. With so great a demand for footwear, which, it is believed, could be produced by our improved machinery and methods in the large quantities required and at prices below those paid for the handmade article in China, it would appear that American manufacturers might produce shoes of Chinese patterns and lay them down in the various ports of the Empire under conditions which would enable dealers there successfully to compete with the native goods.

"The market is expanding steadily because of the constantly increasing purchasing power of the Chinese, and a careful investigation by an expert would, it is confidently asserted by those in close touch with the situation, disclose conditions and opportunities which the manufacturers of the United States should not ignore.

"AN INVITING FIELD.

"Chinese boots and shoes are made by the cheapest labor in the world; but it must be remembered that in the manufacture of the enormous quantity required no machinery of any kind whatsoever is used. The consequence is that while there is a certain necessary uniformity observed in the cut and pattern, the work is slow, the workmanship poor, and the quality of the materials used unserviceable. It is certainly fair to assume that if the natives of China could be supplied with boots and shoes made in exact accord with the styles popular throughout the Empire, possessing the advantages of better material and workmanship, and greater durability, the consumers would welcome their introduction if the price were satisfactory.

"A conservative estimate of the market for Chinese shoes worn by the common classes places the expenditure at $3 (Mexican) per capita a year, while the amount expended by the better classes will vary from $6 to $20 (Mexican) annually. This will afford an idea of the immensity of the demand, but it is obviously impossible, without a comprehensive expert investigation, even to approximate the amount expended annually in China for foot wear.

"MATERIALS IN NATIVE SHOES.

"The shoes worn by the natives are made with leather or cotton-cloth soles, above which is a layer of rags or paper or feathers, with cotton cloth next to the foot. The uppers are made of cotton sheetings or shirtings, Italians, satins, or velvets, dyed either black or blue. Women are employed to sew together the uppers, which are cut by the shoemaker. After that work has been completed the uppers are returned to the shoemaker, who attaches the sole, and the shoes are then ready for distribution through the native dealers. The best quality may be obtained at retail for $1.40 (Mexican) a pair; medium quality, $1.20 a pair; cheap quality, 80 cents a pair; cooly shoes, 50 cents a pair, and women's shoes, 70 cents a pair. The women's shoes are those worn by the so-called "reformed ladies," a class whose numbers are constantly increasing, because of emancipation from the cruel custom of binding the feet. These prices are subject to a reduction of 10 per cent when shoes are purchased at wholesale.

"BOOTS FOR WINTER WEAR.

"In northern China shoes are also universally in use during the warm weather, but with the advent of winter it is the practice of the Chinese to wear what may be called the "Chinese boot." This is also made of cotton sheetings, shirtings, Italians, velvets, or satins, dyed either black or blue. The leg of the boot, which extends about halfway to the knee, is sufficiently large to hold the trousers. The boots have either a leather or a cotton-cloth sole, with a layer of paper, rags, or feathers above and cotton cloth next to the foot. A stiff but inexpensive material is used as a lining to hold the leg of the boot in an upright position, and on the outside is the covering of velvet or cotton cloth, as the case may be. The retail prices of these boots vary, according to the material used, but run from approximately $1.25 to $2.50 (Mexican) a pair. Machinery could be utilized in cutting out the material for boots quite as easily as for shoes.

"PROSPECTIVE MARKET.

"It seems capable of demonstration that an enormous market will eventually be developed for what may be termed "army boots." These boots are cut on the same pattern as those for ordinary wear, but are made mostly of leather. The soles consist of two pieces of thin leather with a third piece inserted at the heel to give a spring while walking. Above this is a layer of rags or paper, and cotton cloth is placed next to the foot. Smooth, well-tanned leather, presumably imported, is used, and like all other footwear worn by the natives of China, these boots are hand made. The retail price is $3.50 (Mexican) a pair, but a reduction is made when wholesale orders are placed.

"In the recent army maneuvers near Tientsin it was estimated that thera were 60,000 Chinese troops in the field. This was regarded as the nucleus of a standing army which the Empire purposes to maintain in the future. The size of this army it is obviously impossible even approximately to estimate, but it may be safely assumed that it will be sufficiently large to make a calculation as to the minimum number of pairs of boots that will be required and the amount that will be expended therefor annually both interesting and instructive to American manufacturers.

"ADVANTAGE OF EARLY OCCUPATION.

"The importance of an immediate investigation of this market by an expert can not be too strongly emphasized. If his knowledge of the cost of production, transportation, handling, and incidental expenses convinces him that boots and shoes, similar in all respects to those now used in China, could be laid down there at a price comparing favorably with that now paid, no time should be lost in introducing them. It may be set down as an incontrovertible fact that in the opening up of a market in China for new goods of whatever description of foreign manufacture, the first "chop" or trade-mark in the field meeting the tastes, the requirements, the whims, the prejudices, and the purchasing power of the natives will become so firmly established and so popular that subsequent attempts to dislodge it by competing nations will be a long, tedious, and, in all probability, an unsuccessful task.

"The feasibility of the introduction of American-made boots and shoes of Chinese patterns for Chinese wear was freely admitted by the business men of the Empire, irrespective of nationality, and they found it difficult to comprehend why experts had not already made a more thorough investigation of the conditions, with a view to taking advantage of this enormous and constantly expanding market."

UNITED STATES COMPARED WITH GREAT BRITAIN IN EXPORT OF SHOES.

Surely, then, the provisions of the Dingley tariff have not retarded our export trade in cattle or the products of cattle or the manufactures from these products. Why, Mr. President, Great Britain has had free trade all these years and cheap labor, and yet, though twelve years ago she exported more than twelve times the boots and shoes we did, we have caught and passed her in this, as in about everything else. We have, under dutiable hides, become the leading exporters of boots and shoes, in spite of the fact that the average price per pair is $1.52, as against 95 cents for those exported from Great Britain, and about all of this difference goes to the American workman.

A TENFOLD INCREASE.

But the great increase in exports of leather, and particularly in boots and shoes, does not compare with the increase in output for domestic consumption. This is shown in the product of the manufactories of Massachusetts, where the increase of value of shoes made was $70,271,966 in 1905, as compared with 1895 when the increase over 1885 was only $7,405,548. A tenfold increase does not look as if the Massachusetts shoe markets were being injured by a small duty on a portion of their material. Dun's Review of the last week in January said:

Products for fall are also ordered freely, notably in the foot-wear industry, and shipments of boots and shoes from Boston for the month thus far eclipse all previous records, which is especially significant when viewed in the light of the rapid growth of the industry in other sections.

BOOTS AND SHOES FROM PROTECTED HIDES MAKE MASSACHUSETTS RICH.

No wonder that Governor Guild and the Boston papers can boast of the great prosperity of Boston and vicinity. Here is a recent extract from the Boston Globe:

Boston is the center of the wealthiest and best purchasing community in the country without any exception whatever.

In the purchasing ability of the average person Boston is far ahead of all according to the national census.

Per capita wealth of the people of Boston, $1,042; New York, $1,337; Philadelphia, $1,127; Chicago, $1,016; St. Louis, $918.

One-twentieth of the wealth of the United States is within 50 miles of Boston.

One-fifth of the savings of the people of the United States is in the Massachusetts savings and cooperative banks to the credit of Massachusetts depositors.

GOVERNOR GUILD ON MASSACHUSETTS PROSPERITY.

Governor Guild said in his annual address to the legislature of Massachusetts last January:

Massachusetts, fourth from the foot in area, is seventh from the top in population, fourth from the top in the annual value of her manufactures, and third from the top in the annual amount paid in wages. Measured by assessed valuation of the property in her borders, Massachusetts is exceeded by but two States. Fourth from the foot in area, Massachusetts is third from the top in wealth.

The annual value of the manufactured products of Massachusetts increased by but $175,173,033 between 1885 and 1895. It increased by $300,267,558 between 1895 and 1905. The total value of goods made in Massachusetts was $1,150,074,860 in 1905.

On October 31 the total amount on deposit in our savings banks was, in 1885, $274,998,412; in 1895, $438,269,861, and in 1905, $662,808,312. The increase in the last decade was greater by over $58,000,000 than in the decade that preceded it. In 1885 the average deposit for each person of population was $141.64; in 1895, $175.69, and in 1905, $220.67. The gain in deposits per capita in the last decade was greater by nearly one-third than the gain in the preceding decade.

We do not envy Massachusetts her great prosperity. We all rejoice in it, but we do not propose to have her gain still greater prosperity at the expense of her western customers. Not that I think her 75,000 leather and shoe workers would get any more wages if we had free hides; not a cent; nor would we have cheaper shoes. Neither higher wages nor cheaper shoes are promised by the manufacturers, but they would like to put the amount of the duty in their own pockets. It amounts to at most only from about 2 to 4 cents on a pair of shoes, but it amounts to nothing at all except to the limited extent to which foreign hides are used in shoes for domestic trade.

A CHALLENGE.

I boldly challenge anyone to show to the public any date or time when the retail prices of boots and shoes changed even one penny because of free hides or tariff on hides. Prices to the consumer—the wearer—have never changed an iota on account of this infinitesimal difference in cost of manufacturing.

NOBODY ASKS REPEAL OF TARIFF ON SHOES.

Again, I say that the farmers and cattle growers who buy millions of protected shoes will not consent to a repeal of the duty on shoes, and this they do not ask.

It seems that a few manufacturers pretend to be willing to have the duty on boots and shoes abolished. I do not say they are insincere in this proposition, but I do say they are safe in making it, for the duty on boots and shoes will neither be abolished nor reduced, and they know it.

And right here, Mr. President, I want to quote a petition of the Massachusetts Board of Trade, inspired, no doubt, by the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association and the National Shoe Wholesalers' Association. It is as follows:

Whereas the revenue bill of July 24, 1897, created a tax of 15 per cent ad valorem on imported hides; and

Whereas after more than seven years' experience it appears that the operation of said tax is of no general benefit, but, on the contrary, works a specific and decided injury to a great industry, and that a large number of manufacturers, merchants, and workmen are adversely affected by the operation of this tax; and

Whereas it does not appear that any considerable body of persons of any class are benefited thereby, but, on the other hand, that the removal of the present tax thereon would not be effective in producing a reduction in the cost to consumers of all shoes made from leathers, especially on heavy staple shoes worn by farmers and laborers:

Therefore we, the Massachusetts Board of Trade, respectfully petition and pray that your honorable bodies will take such action at the present session of Congress as will bring about the repeal of said tax of 15 per cent ad valorem on hides imported into this country.

HIDES WORTH ABSOLUTELY NOTHING ON RANGE.

Mr. President, those statements are misleading, if not false. I think it will be found on examination that the farmers and ranchmen who have cattle to sell make up a very "considerable body of persons." And, furthermore, it has been of vital benefit to them—the tariff on hides. To illustrate: With free hides, during the three or four awful years—the result of the Wilson-Gorman tariff on general business—cattle hides on the ranges of Western States, such as Wyoming, were not worth the taking off. In killing beef the hides had necessarily to come off, but even then they were thrown aside and never shipped, because the railroad freight charges alone amounted to more than the hides would fetch in market, and so they were thrown aside by the thousands and rotted where thrown; whereas now, in these same States, with railroad charges equally as high, each hide brings several dollars and adds just that much to the worth of every head of cattle.

DUTY ON HIDES A GENERAL BENEFIT.

The duty on hides has been of general benefit and of injury to no one. Neither manufacturers, merchants, nor workingmen have been affected adversely by the operation of the duty; on the contrary, all have been benefited through increased employment, increased wages, and increased sales, while the cattle grower has certainly benefited by a larger sale of his product at profitable prices. I do not deny that the duty increased the price of hides somewhat, but the increased value is of slight moment in the cost of each pair of shoes, but is of much concern as to each cattle hide. The demand for leather has increased the price the world over, but the increased value, while of benefit to the producer—that is, the cattle grower—has not made shoes any dearer. A greatly increased demand, coupled with competition among manufacturers to produce a pair of shoes at the lowest possible price, and to produce the best possible shoe at the price, has resulted in an enormous increase in the output of shoes. The greater the output, the lower the cost of production. No one will deny that it costs far less per pair to turn out 100,000,000 pairs of shoes than 50,000,000 pairs.

FOREIGN CHEAP LABOR WOULD INJURE US.

But suppose we had free hides and free shoes, and what would be the result? We should soon have millions of pairs of cheap shoes dumped on our market. The material being the same, the foreign manufacturer with his low-priced labor—a labor costing one-half or one-third of ours—could close our factories or else compel our laborers to work for starvation wages. That would be the alternative, Mr. President. The purchasing power of the 200,000 persons now making shoes would be cut in half or disappear altogether, and so much of our home market would be lost to the farmer and other manufacturers. We have had just such experiences, and it is far from guesswork. But I do not apprehend any reduction in the duty on boots and shoes. The shoe manufacturers and workmen of Massachusetts and other States will continue to prosper, and I appeal to them to cease their agitation against the prosperity of 6,000,000 growers of cattle whose market is more stable, more secure, more profitable, because of the equitable and compensating duty on their product. The hide is a valuable part of the animal.

It is useless to assert that the duty is not a benefit to the grower of cattle. You may call it a by-product if you will, but it is also a by-product of the foreign cattle grower, and free importation means a depression of the home market. Our cattle growers do not ask for an extortionate price for their product, but they do ask for a profitable price and for such protection as will enable them to pay the prevailing high prices for feed and labor and get an adequate return for their investment and work.

LEATHER-MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY GROWING.

The following comparative summary of the years 1905 and 1900 of the statistics of leather manufacturers, compiled by the Census Bureau, does not show any retrogression in the leather-manufacturing industry:

PRELIMINARY SUMMARY.

[Bureau of the Census, May 5, 1906.]

The Director of the Census announced to-day the result of the tabulation of the statistics of leather, tanned, curried, and finished, for the calendar year 1904, forming a part of the census of manufactures of 1905, taken in conformity with the act of Congress of March 6, 1902. The figures indicate that there has been a substantial increase in the leather industry in the United States, as compared with the statistics of 1900, which covered the fiscal year ending May 31.

Comparative figures for 1905 and 1900 are shown in the following summary:

a Decrease.

A VIVID CONTRAST.

In vivid contrast with the prosperity which prevails in this industry in the United States is the depression in other countries. As an instance, I present a copy of the Daily Consular and Trade Report for Saturday, June 23, 1906, which contains the following:

LEATHER TRADE DEPRESSION—MANY GERMAN ESTABLISHMENTS IN FINANCIAL STRAITS.

Consul W. C. Hamm, of Hull, furnishes the following interesting account of the depression in the German leather trades. It was printed in an English paper from a special correspondent, and says, in part:

"For a series of years the German leather industry has been experiencing a trying time. Complaints of unremunerative business are now more general than ever. During the last three years the reports and balance sheets of most of the leather companies have disclosed a serious reduction of profits, while many weaker concerns, unable to stand the strain, have disappeared. Last year's financial declarations told a depressing tale. For example, a number of companies, with one-fourth to one-half million dollars capital, showed deficits of $10,000 to $337,000. Three leather works went into liquidation, four made arrangements with their creditors, two reduced their capital, one lost the whole share capital and disposed of its works, while another at Berlin was compelled to raise $412,500 new preference capital in order to liquidate its bank overdraft. A Mainz concern has not paid a dividend for nine years, and so on.

"REASONS FOR TRADE DIFFICULTIES.

"Some of the causes are indicated in the reports of the companies affected. The most general is the high price of hides and skins and the inability of leather manufacturers to obtain for the finished product prices commensurate with the advance in the cost of raw material. 'Through the high price of calf skins,' says one company, 'there was hardly any profit, especially on black leathers,' while another reports that its losses are due to 'high prices of skins.' In 1902 this latter firm made a loss of $11,210, in 1903 one of over $75,000, and in 1904 of $2,240, in consequence of which it was compelled in 1905 to cancel part of its capital. A Dresden concern reports that 'from America, England, Japan, etc., practically no hides are coming to the German market.' To remedy or alleviate some of the effects of this shortage in the supply of hides and skins an attempt has been made to form a cartel representing four-fifths of the German tanning works, but it proved futile owing to the conflict of interests between the great companies and the weaker concerns."

AN INDEPENDENT-DEMOCRATIC OPINION.

On this question of free hides, I would call attention to two recent editorials in the Washington Post, an independent newspaper with general Democratic proclivities. One of these, headed "Wants free trade in what she would buy and protection in what she would sell," is as follows:

The committee on Federal relations of the Massachusetts legislature is anxious for somebody to tinker with the tariff and bring about a mild sort of tariff reform. The persistent agitation of this subject in Massachusetts serves to vindicate the late General Hancock, who considered the tariff a local question, and for that everybody laughed at him. Massachusetts longs for free raw materials, but will not surrender protection for finished products. Thus she would have Ohio, Texas, Wyoming, and Montana furnish her looms with free wool, and she would furnish those States protected woolens. At least that was what Massachusetts was after when the Hon. Roger Q. Mills invaded, overran, occupied, and subjugated "the enemies' country" in 1890, when Massachusetts sent a small majority of free traders to Congress, and New England, en gros, sent a large majority of that faith to speak for her in the national councils.

And it was in response to Democratic majorities in New England that Mr. Springer brought his "popgun" tariff bills putting such "raw materials" as wool, hides, coal, and iron ore on the free list. No doubt it would be a great thing for New England if the standpatters would only resurrect the "popgun" bills, enact them into law, and then cease tariff tinkering forever. But the standpatters do not intend to do any such thing. They say that Ohio and Texas are as much entitled to free woolens as Massachusetts is to free wool, and there is force in it, as there is in the declaration that comes from Iowa and Kansas that free hides mean free shoes. It is true that the beef trust reaps nearly all the protection that is given to hides; but certain Republican statesmen have so persistently asseverated that it is for the benefit of the farmer and rancher that all Iowa, Kansas, Texas, and the entire agricultural world of the great West and Southwest are convinced that they make money by the tariff on hides; and Massachusetts may as well make up her mind that as long as there is a duty on shoes there will be a duty on hides. Massachusetts can not eat her cake and have it. No other community has profited by the operation of the protective principle than she, and the now dominant West is not going to permit Massachusetts to eat all the sunny side of the peach and leave the shady side for the Mississippi Valley. What a harvest it would be for Massachusetts—free trade in what she would buy and protection for what she would sell! That is not the square deal. Nor is it a square deal for Massachusetts to have free salt with which to cure her fish, while Kansas must put up with protected salt with which to save her bacon; but that is what is going on. * * *

Another editorial article from the Washington Post, headed "Taxed or free hides," reads:

Massachusetts will be in a process of eruption until she gets a free-trade market in which to buy and retains a protected market in which to sell. That is what Massachusetts is clamoring for, and that is what Massachusetts is not going to get. Her business is to turn raw materials into finished products, and she demands free raw materials and protection for her finished goods. It looks as though there is a streak of yellow up there somewhere.

The great grievance is hides. Let us examine the figures on hides. According to the latest publication on the subject, we imported, the fiscal year 1904, hides amounting to 186,365,478 pounds, valued at $41,885,577, on which no duty was levied—they were free. In addition, there were imported that year 131,705,012 pounds of hides, valued at $16,116,392, on which duties were paid to the amount of $2,417,458, or a beggarly 15 per cent.

That is what the tariff on hides costs Massachusetts for revenues, assuming that she uses all the imported hides on which a tariff is levied, which she doesn't by a long sight.

What does Massachusetts make out of the tariff on her finished products of leather goods? Boots and shoes are protected to the amount of 25 per cent; gloves receive 53 per cent as a protection against the pauper gloves of France and Germany. Harness and saddlery get 45 per cent protection; shoestrings are protected to the amount of 50 per cent. All other manufactures of leather are protected by a duty of 35 per cent, except importations from Cuba under the reciprocity convention, and Cuba sent us not a shred for the year 1904.

Then, what is Massachusetts kicking about? She has by far the best of the bargain. The protection accorded her is two or three times the revenues exacted of her. Old England has been regarded as considerable of a hog in commercial matters since Edward III hanged those of his subjects he caught exporting raw materials. That was centuries ago and long before Christopher Columbus was born; but the England of the present and the past threescore years has been content to forego protection, or even revenue duties, on finished products in consideration of free raw materials.

Massachusetts might as well understand that she is not going to get the sunny side of all the peaches. Before she gets free hides New Jersey, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Iowa, Kansas, and Nebraska must consent. According to Proctor Knott, a certain dog that Lige Pinkston passed judgment on was guilty of "barking up a tree there was nothing in."

That is what Massachusetts is doing in the hide line, and if she doesn't believe it, let her make an appointment for Leslie M. Shaw in Faneuil Hall. He will mighty quick tell her what the tariff on hides is for.

From the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1905 I present the following:

IMPORTS, HIDES, DUTIABLE.

Year.	Quantity.	Total value.
1898	126,243,595	$13,624,969
1899	130,396,020	13,621,946
1900	163,865,165	19,408,217
1901	129,174,624	14,647,413
1902	148,627,907	17,474,059
1903	131,640,325	16,159,902
1904	85,370,168	10,989,075
1905	113,177,357	14,949,628

IMPORTS, HIDES, FREE.

1898	54,607,534	7,667,342
1899	66,965,785	9,877,771
1900	100,070,795	16,539,807
1901	77,989,617	12,995,567
1902	89,457,680	15,054,400
1903	102,340,303	16,942,982
1904	103,024,752	17,045,504
1905	126,893,934	22,868,797

IMPORTS OF FREE HIDES INCREASE MUCH—IMPORTS OF DUTIABLE HIDES INCREASE BUT LITTLE.

From this table it will be seen that the decision of the board of appraisers to the effect that hides must weigh more than 12 pounds flint dry has had a peculiar effect, namely, that beginning with 1898 the importation of free hides, amounting to less than $8,000,000 in value, has increased in 1905 to $22,869,000. It will also be noted that the importation of dutiable hides paying 15 per cent ad valorem has increased but little. On the basis of the importation for 1905, the total amount of duties collected on hides amounted to only $2,242,444, and this does not include the rebates paid to manufacturers using foreign hides. It should be remembered that only hides of cattle bear a duty and that a hide is not a hide unless it weighs more than 12 pounds flint dry.

THE SHOE MANUFACTURER GETS HIS REBATE.

Why, Mr. President, we are importing 40,000,000 hides a year free of duty, and only a small portion of the shoe manufacturers' material is "taxed," as he chooses to term it. This fact makes his demand for free cattle hides the more selfish and unjust, and I do not believe his contention will be sustained by the people when they understand fully how well the manufacturer is protected and how freely he may import his material, for it must be constantly borne in mind that the duty on imported hides entering into shoes for export is wholly rebated and can not be the least burden for this trade.

THE FARMER THE GREAT CONSUMER OF LEATHER.

Then, too, there are other things besides boots and shoes to be considered. The farmers are the largest purchasers of leather products—of saddles and harness, trunks, purses, bags, etc. Our total leather product was valued at over $200,000,000 in 1900, and the total value of hides was far in excess of $100,000,000.

It does not take long to make a pair of shoes or a harness or a saddle or any finished leather product. It takes three years to raise and market a steer. Three years of time and attention and labor added to cost of feeding. Should not the grower then have some protection? Cattle growers abroad do not utilize the by-products as we do. Foreign shipments are large from nomadic countries, and many place an export duty on hides, which duty we must pay. Had we not better pay it to our own producers and give them the encouragement and protection they so well deserve?

The development of the industry which uses as its raw material our farm animals has been so phenomenal during the past half century that it is to me incomprehensible that anyone would want to check it in the least. During the fifty years from 1850 to 1900 the price paid for the material used in the industry I have considered increased from $9,450,000 to $683,580,000, a seventy-five fold increase.

THE FARMER IS PROTECTED LESS THAN OTHERS.

In considering this question of free hides from the standpoint of protectionism—and that, I frankly confess, is my standpoint—it is essential to inquire, first, is the present reasonable duty on hides of benefit to the stock grower? Second, do the farmers of the United States derive the benefit from the retention of that duty? Both of these questions must be answered in the affirmative. It has already been shown that the value to the farmer of every beef hide he produces is increased by the tariff. It must then appear that this duty is valuable to the farmer and would be reluctantly relinquished by the farmer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am attracted by the remark the Senator has just made that the duty on hides benefits the farmer, the cattle raiser. I contended for a good many years that that was true, but there are people in my section of the country who insist that the duty goes absolutely to the beef packers and to those who handle the cattle after they have left the ranges and the farms. If I understand the Senator correctly, speaking with expert knowledge, he says that the farmer does benefit because of that protection?

Mr. WARREN. The stock raisers and farmers do benefit very directly by the duty on hides. I will call attention to one condition I know of which will answer that question. For a few years preceding the time when the duty was put upon hides cattle raisers in certain States in the interior, like, for instance, the State of Wyoming, could not get enough for cattle hides to pay the shipping expenses alone from the ranches to market, and business concerns in which I happened to have some interest at the time never shipped a hide for many, many months. The hides from cattle killed for home consumption were taken off and thrown away, because the freight to market amounted to more than the total sum we would receive for the hides. In fact, the junk piles around the ranches, and even the prairies, were strewn for a long season with these valueless hides.

Since that time the price of hides to the farmer has ranged all the way, net, from, perhaps, $1 to $8 apiece. I do not say that the entire increase is due to the duty. Some part of it is no doubt due to changes in business. But I do say when we had no duty hides in our country for a good space of time were worth absolutely nothing, and ever since the imposition of the tariff on hides they have been a valuable and quick asset.

PERMANENCY OF TARIFF RESTS WITH THE FARMER.

The permanency of protection as a national policy rests largely with the American farmer. When he arrives at the conviction that protection is being withheld from him in order that the profits of manufacturers may be swelled, then the end of protection will swiftly come.

Mr. President, our tariff laws when framed by protectionists have never been made to favor one State, one section of the country, or one industry. They never will be. We are all so interdependent that an injury to one industry or to one part of the country is an injury to all, and a benefit to one is a benefit to all. Under a universal protective tariff our freight cars are loaded going both ways—from East to West, from West to East; from North to South, from South to North. The farmer is prosperous, as is the manufacturer, and employee of both. A protective tariff is a compensating tariff and always must be, else it would not give protection at all, and unless it is given to all, it is given fully to none. Protection can not be sectional and selfish. It must be general and adequate. Such protection is now in force under the operation of the present law. It is the most perfect law we have known. We shall, as a matter of course, have to revise it some time, but not to-day. We are too busy, too well employed, too well paid for our labor, too prosperous to think seriously of tariff revision in the year of our Lord 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer the resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARREN. It has been suggested that it should go to the Committee on the Census, and that is agreeable to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 19754. An act to provide for the distribution of public documents to the library of the Philippine government at Manila, P. I., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

H. R. 19755. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to loan temporarily to the Philippine government a vessel of the United States Navy for use in connection with nautical schools of the Philippine Islands was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 20173. An act to authorize Henry T. Henderson and his associates to divert the waters of Little River from the lands of the United States for use of electric-light and power plant was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 20175. An act to authorize the Missouri Central Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River near the city of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri; and

H. R. 20290. An act to amend the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905.

LICENSED OFFICERS OF VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendments of the House to Senate bill 6355 may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6355) concerning licensed officers of vessels, which were, on page 1, line 9, to strike out "and chief mates," and on the same page, in line 13, after the word "engineer," to insert "in charge of a watch."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES N. ROBINSON AND SALLIE B. M'COMB.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the Chair to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. FULTON, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. MARTIN.

BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to hear the bill read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question or two for my own information. I understand from the first section of the bill that all aliens will have to be registered in this new bureau.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is true, Mr. President. As they leave the ship a record is to be made of the personal description of the aliens and a certificate is given them, and a copy of that is sent to the Department.

Mr. MALLORY. That is, without reference to whether they expect to remain here or not, I understand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is to be done in every case.

Mr. MALLORY. Now, on another point, I should like to inquire of the Senator why it is that Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands are not included in the provision regarding the jurisdiction of the courts in those islands, giving them, as is the case in some of our Territories, the power to naturalize aliens? Why is it that the United States court in Porto Rico, for instance, is not authorized to naturalize an alien in Porto Rico?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am informed that in the House this subject was studied very carefully and that that omission was made because they were not entirely clear in regard to the status of the inhabitants of those districts, under the decisions of the courts. I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has some amendments which he proposes to offer to the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer an amendment to the bill, to be attached to it as an additional section, which has special reference to Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. It is a provision that passed the Senate by a unanimous vote—that is, it passed without any opposition, it is perhaps more proper to state—in the Fifty-eighth Congress. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following as a new section:

That all the applicable provisions of the naturalization laws of the United States shall apply to and be held to authorize the admission to citizenship of all persons not citizens who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, and who may become residents of any State or organized Territory of the United States, with the following modifications: The applicant shall not be required to renounce allegiance to any foreign sovereignty; he shall make his declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States at least one year prior to his admission; and residence within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing such permanent allegiance, shall be regarded as residence within the United States within the meaning of the five years' residence clause of the existing law.

Mr. MALLORY. If it is the purpose of the Senator from Ohio to enable the residents of Porto Rico and the Philippines to be made citizens of the United States, the object will not be accomplished by that amendment. I do not know that that is the purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. It is not, unless they come to the United States and become citizens of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. Unless they come to the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. There is another bill pending before the Senate which does provide that the citizens of Porto Rico shall be citizens of the United States, but that bill, although favorably reported from the committee, is on the Calendar and has not been considered by the Senate, and it would be impossible, I am sure, to get favorable action upon it at this session.

In view of that fact I offer this amendment, which simply provides that when a Porto Rican comes to the United States he may stand equally as favorably before the naturalization laws of the United States as the Spaniard or any other alien, and may become a citizen of the United States. The thing that stands in his way now is that he has no allegiance to any foreign potentate or power to renounce, and this simply opens to him a way to become a citizen if he comes here.

Now, answering the Senator's further suggestion, I thought of offering an amendment to insert the words, after "Alaska," at the bottom of page 2 of the last line, "and for Porto Rico," so that anyone in the island of Porto Rico who wanted to become a citizen of the United States who is an alien who would comply with the naturalization laws could do so there. But I imagine that would give rise to discussion, and I concluded not to do it for that reason.

Mr. MALLORY. It strikes me, if the Senator will permit me, that that is a very proper amendment and in line with his purpose. Unfortunately, the people of Porto Rico have no status at all. They are not citizens of anything except Porto Rico, and Porto Rico represents nothing. They can not become citizens of the United States.

It seems to me very proper that we should vest our Porto Rican court with jurisdiction to naturalize foreigners. The court in Porto Rico—I believe there is only one—is a court of equal dignity, and there is no risk to be run of any fraud or any impropriety, and it is just as well to allow that court to naturalize Porto Ricans and foreigners also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will allow the unfinished business to be laid aside for a few minutes. I think this naturalization bill will pass in a very few moments. It is a measure of great importance; it has been most carefully studied in both Houses; and I think it would be a great misfortune if we could not dispose of it at this time. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside for ten minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business may be laid aside for ten minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the Senator from Ohio will offer that amendment and also make it applicable to the courts of the Philippine Islands. The people are in the same miserable condition there.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure that would give rise to debate. I am not only sure of it, but I am assured of it.

Mr. SPOONER. It will.

Mr. FORAKER. In view of that fact, and in view of the fact that the question of making the citizens of Porto Rico citizens of the United States will necessarily come before the Senate when the other bill is brought up for consideration, I would rather not precipitate that question now.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator propose to bring up that bill at this session?

Mr. FORAKER. No, sir; not at this session. I stated a moment ago that I know it would be useless to do so at this session, but at the next session I shall insist—unless, perhaps, I find it useless to do so—upon the consideration of the question whether or not we shall give them the status as citizens of the United States. Meanwhile this would remedy the difficulty as to all Porto Ricans who come to reside in the United States, and put them on as good a plane, and no better, than aliens are on. I think we ought to do that. This will go through without any objection, and it will be very helpful. I would rather not press the other at this time.

Mr. MALLORY. I shall offer the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio, that the court of Porto Rico be permitted to have jurisdiction. I will not go so far as to include the courts of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. FORAKER. Then will the Senator offer that after the pending amendment has been acted upon?

Mr. MALLORY. I will wait.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. I did not, perhaps, listen as attentively to the bill when it was read as I ought to have done, but in response to a question propounded by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that all aliens entering the United States would be required to register, or their names would be placed in a book and a certificate would be sent to the Department at Washington. Am I correct?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is substantially correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does that apply to tourists?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Only to immigrants.

Mr. GALLINGER. Simply immigrants?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Simply alien immigrants who come here.

Mr. LODGE. Upon their arrival in this country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the amendment I offered disposed of before anything else is taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a committee amendment which would come first in order.

Mr. LODGE. The committee amendment is withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand the Senator from Vermont, who has the bill in charge, to say that he is willing to accept the amendment I offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont in reference to the provision on page 5, regarding the petition to be filed. The alien is required to state, among other things, that he is not "a polygamist or believer in polygamy." I wish to ask the Senator whether it was the intention by that to provide that a person who entertains a mere belief in polygamy may be excluded from naturalization, or whether it was intended to apply to one who is violating the law and who believes in the practice of polygamy as distinguished from the mere abstract belief?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know what was in the mind of the House when they passed the bill. My own thought is that which is expressed in the immigration bill, that it means a believer in the practice of polygamy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think that provision should be in the bill, but I think in its present form it is going too far. I therefore move to amend the bill on page 5, line 12, by inserting after the words "believer in" the words "the practice of;" so as to read: "a polygamist or believer in the practice of polygamy."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The amendment is accepted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 12, before the word "polygamy," insert the words "the practice of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The same amendment should be made on page 23, line 10, after the word "in."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, line 10, before the word "polygamy," insert "the practice of;" so as to read: "nor a believer in the practice of polygamy."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On page 24, line 21, after the word "in," I move the same amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 21, before the word "polygamy," insert the words "the practice of;" so as to read: "nor a believer in the practice of polygamy."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer an amendment at the bottom of page 2, in the last line. I move to strike out the word "and" before "Alaska," and to insert the words "and Porto Rico" after "Alaska;" so as to read: "Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 25, before the word "Alaska," strike out the word "and," and after "Alaska" insert the words "and Porto Rico."

Mr. SPOONER. How would it read then?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It would then read:

United States circuit and district courts now existing, or which may hereafter be established by Congress in any State, United States district courts for the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Hawaii, Alaska, and Porto Rico, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts for the Indian Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 179) providing for the improvement of a certain portion of the Mississippi River, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HOPKINS. A joint resolution to the same effect was passed by the Senate yesterday. I ask that that joint resolution be recalled from the House, and that this joint resolution be put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution which passed the Senate, referred to by the Senator from Illinois, will be recalled from the House of Representatives. The Senator from Illinois asks for the present consideration of the House joint resolution, which will be read.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to expend any portion of the balance now remaining to the credit of the improvement for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio River to and including the mouth of the Missouri River, for the repair or completion of improvements already under way, or for the construction of other works, in accordance with general plans already made or approved: Provided, That such expenditures shall only be made for improvements which shall be useful for purposes of navigation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Senate bill 5133, which is the unfinished business, was laid aside for ten minutes, and that time has expired.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOPKINS. The joint resolution will take no time at all. It is the same as the joint resolution which was passed by the Senate yesterday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside until fifteen minutes past 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none. The unfinished business will be laid aside until fifteen minutes past 1. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the joint resolution (S. R. 70) providing for the improvement of a certain portion of the Mississippi River, be recalled from the House of Representatives, and I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate joint resolution 70 was passed will be entered.

HOURS OF LABOR OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FORAKER (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes). What is the delay, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business, at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, was laid aside until a quarter after 1.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be taken up now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not had the time, Mr. President, because of the multifarious duties that have been thrust upon me, to give very great consideration to the pending bill, but the examination that I have made of it leads me to believe that it is an unnecessary, if not a pernicious, measure. For that reason I shall take occasion to express my opposition to it and will probably cast by vote against it when it is submitted to the Senate for its decision.

I was somewhat surprised this morning to see in a Washington newspaper that a filibuster had been conducted yesterday against the bill. I was here and was not aware of the fact that a filibuster was in progress. Perhaps I would not know a filibuster when I saw it, for the reason that during my twenty years of public life I have never been a party to a filibuster.

I have been here from the first day of the session, unpaired, and have voted, I think with two exceptions, on every roll call that has been had in the Senate during the session; and I have never believed that it was a dignified or a proper thing for the Senate to conduct a filibuster on a bill of this character. There may be occasions when some great question is pending upon which parties are sharply divided, a question the determination of which one party in this body might feel would be detrimental to the best interests of the country, when factious opposition might be justified, but I do not think this bill belongs to that class. For that reason I certainly shall not be a party to any filibuster against it, if any shall be attempted, and I will say that I do not believe there is any such purpose in the mind of anybody.

Mr. President, Judge Grosscup, of Chicago, who I think has never been charged with being unduly partial to corporations, in an address which he made a few days ago spoke of the agitation that was going on in the country against corporations as being an indiscriminate raid on corporations, if I remember his words; and I have sometimes been forced to feel that, however others may view the subject, there is in the minds of a considerable portion of the American people at present a disposition and a determination to make an indiscriminate raid on corporations, whether they are of one character or another. I certainly, if that be so, greatly deprecate that tendency and that feeling.

This bill proposes to regulate the hours that men shall labor on the railroads, particularly on the trains of railroads. I have been here a great many years trying to perform my duties as well as I can, Mr. President, and no single complaint ever came to me along this line. No suggestion, no letter, no protest, no petition has reached me saying that the men who are employed on our railroads were dissatisfied with the relations which exist between them and the managers and owners of those railroads. If any such complaint has arisen it certainly must have been in some other section of the country than that which I so poorly represent in this Chamber, but it seems to me that if it had arisen in any section of the country I would have absorbed some knowledge of it.

At present there is an amicable arrangement between railroad corporations and their employees in reference to the operation of trains on the great railroads of the country; and it seems to me, Mr. President, that we are treading on rather dangerous ground when we consider the fact that amicable arrangements do exist and that there is no ill feeling between the two parties—I say it seems to me that we are treading on rather dangerous ground when we put into law, or attempt to put into law, what is being properly arranged by mutual arrangement and mutual agreement. I do not apprehend that this legislation, if it shall be enacted, will have any effect whatever in the part of the country from which I come, but I have apprehensions, and very grave apprehensions, that, if it shall be enacted, it will have serious consequences on the great railroad systems of the western country, where there are such long stretches and where the matter of arranging the hours must be an extremely difficult and complex question.

On this subject, Mr. President, I ask to have read a letter from a railroad attorney—Mr. H. T. Newcomb, counsel for the Delaware and Hudson Company. He puts this question in a very illuminating way; and I think that some of the objections which Mr. Newcomb makes to this legislation, even though he be a railroad attorney, are worthy of the serious consideration of the Senate before the vote is cast on this important bill. I ask that the Secretary read the letter which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Since appearing before your committee on behalf of the Delaware and Hudson Company, on May 4, 1906, with relation to the bills to limit the hours of service of railroad employees (H. R. 4438, H. R. 16676, H. R. 18671, and H. R. 18961), I have obtained from our operating officers certain information concerning the practical consequences which the proposed measure would have. It seems to me that it is desirable that this information should be before your committee, and I respectfully request that you will accept this letter as a part of my statement.

The great bulk of the traffic of the Delaware and Hudson Company originates either at Binghamton, N. Y., or Carbondale, Pa., and is carried either to Albany, Mechanicsville, or Mohawk, N. Y. Carbondale is the point at which the anthracite coal traffic of the company is gathered for transportation to delivering points, and Binghamton is the point of connection with the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western and Erie railways, which, together with the lines of the Delaware and Hudson and its eastern connections, form through routes for traffic originating in the West and destined to points in the State of New York and in New England. At Mohawk the Delaware and Hudson connects with the New York Central, at Albany with the Boston and Albany, and at Mechanicsville with the Boston and Maine. From Albany traffic is also distributed via the Hudson River. Oneonta is a division point on the main line of the Delaware and Hudson, 61 miles northeast of Binghamton and 94 miles northeast of Carbondale. It is 82 miles southwest of Albany, 71 miles southwest of Mohawk, and 87 miles southwest of Mechanicsville. The ordinary runs of train crews in the freight service are arranged with reference to these points. Crews from Binghamton to Oneonta, 61 miles, make the return trip immediately. The same is true from Oneonta to Albany, Oneonta to Mohawk, and Oneonta to Mechanicsville. The only run which is made in but one direction is that from Carbondale to Oneonta, 94 miles.

The train men employed by the Delaware and Hudson are, with very few exceptions, paid on the mileage basis, receiving 100 miles pay for a day's work, and being paid for 10 miles for every hour which they are on duty in excess of eleven hours.

The run from Carbondale to Oneonta, 94 miles, is, as I have said, the only one which is not commonly doubled within a day. On this run the men are obliged to lay off after running the 94 miles, which distance is often made in seven or eight hours, and commonly in from ten to eleven hours. The attitude of the men is fully shown by the fact that this is the least popular run on the road; preference on the part of train men is unanimous in favor of any of the other runs. This is because they feel that it is a hardship to be required to lay over away from home, not only on account of the extra expense to them which it involves, but because in other respects they are necessarily deprived of the comforts to which they are entitled during the hours that they do not devote to labor. Although this run is frequently made in from seven to eight hours, the enactment of H. R. 18671 would make it absolutely illegal to permit these men to start for their homes until they had had at least ten hours of idleness. This would practically require them, in order to obtain any proper rest whatever, to maintain adequate quarters for rest at both ends of the division. The men very much prefer to make the return run after a briefer interval of rest. It should be said that for this run of 94 miles the men are paid for 100 miles.

The "turn" run from Binghamton to Oneonta, 122 miles, is commonly made within sixteen hours. The other "turn" runs of the company require slightly more. The men are allowed seventeen hours and twenty-four minutes for the double run Oneonta to Albany and return, 164 miles; they are allowed fifteen hours and twelve minutes for the double run Oneonta to Mohawk and return, 142 miles, and they are allowed eighteen hours and twenty-four minutes for the double run Oneonta to Mechanicsville and return, 174 miles. The only way that these runs could so certainly be brought within a maximum of sixteen hours as to protect the company from danger of occasionally violating the terms of such a law as that proposed would be to make them all single runs. In other words, after running any of these distances the men would have to be required to take a ten hours' layoff, involving, as it would, putting them to the expense and discomfort of providing themselves with quarters in which to spend idle time away from their homes.

I have already in this letter called your attention to the fact that under its contracts with its employees this company pays for 100 miles for each day's labor—that is, on the 94-mile run from Carbondale to Oneonta there is an addition of constructive mileage for which the men are paid amounting to 6 miles. Now, if the other runs, which at present are doubled, were made single runs, each of them would have to be paid for as for 100 miles. Thus, to the 61 actual miles from Binghamton to Oneonta would be added 39 constructive miles, or 64 per cent; to the 82 actual miles from Oneonta to Albany would be added 18 constructive miles, or 22 per cent; to the 71 actual miles from Oneonta to Mohawk would be added 29 constructive miles, or 41 per cent, and to the 87 actual miles from Oneonta to Mechanicsville would be added 13 constructive miles, or 15 per cent. The labor expense of conducting the business of the company would be increased by these proportions. It is to be observed that while this would be the result to the company, the accompanying consequence to the employees now in its service would be a reduction of earnings, while at the same time they would be put to additional expense. For example, in another part of the system than that on which traffic is most dense, which has been discussed above, this company has a run from Albany to Whitehall, a distance of 80 miles, which is commonly doubled within the day. While under favorable conditions this can be done in sixteen hours, if the proposed law were adopted, this company, for its own protection, would be obliged to make it a single run. For the 160 miles, at present, an engineer receives $6.56. If he were only permitted to run 80 miles, he would be paid for 100 miles, but would only receive $4.10, out of which he would have to expend at least 75 cents for the extra cost of board and lodging during his layoff away from home. Thus, while the company would be forced to pay $8.20 for what it now obtains for $6.56, an increase of 25 per cent, the individual employee would really be considerably damaged.

In order to keep the men fully employed and the freight moving under the conditions that would be imposed by the enactment of any of the measures under discussion, this company would be compelled largely to increase its locomotive equipment. It would also have to provide additional terminal facilities, and in many other ways the adjustment to the radically new methods demanded to meet the legislation would entail upon the company large expenditures. Beyond this, it is certain that if the railways of the United States were compelled immediately to adjust themselves to such a law as that proposed, they would find it impossible, at short notice, to obtain the additional equipment and facilities which it would require. The consequent interference with traffic movement and the injury to the business interests of the country it is quite impossible to estimate. Traffic congestion and general disorganization and demoralization of the service would be certain to be the immediate result. Certainly, if Congress is to impose this burden upon the railway business of the country, it ought not to do so without ample warning and full opportunity to comply with the conditions of the law.

I am, Mr. Chairman, with great respect,

Very truly, yours, H. T. NEWCOMB,
Counsel for the Delaware and Hudson Company.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allee	Clark, Wyo.	Kittredge	Piles
Ankeny	Clay	La Follette	Proctor
Bacon	Daniel	Lodge	Rayner
Benson	Dick	McCreary	Scott
Berry	Dillingham	McLaurin	Simmons
Bexeridge	Elkins	Mallory	Smoot
Blackburn	Foraker	Martin	Stone
Brandegee	Frazier	Millard	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Fulton	Morgan	Tillman
Burkett	Gallinger	Nelson	Warner
Burnham	Gamble	Overman	Warren
Carmack	Hemenway	Penrose	Wetmore
Carter	Kean	Perkins	Whyte

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the letter that has just been read from the desk, it seems to me, is full of thoughtful suggestions that ought not to escape the attention of Senators when they come to vote on this bill. It is shown very conclusively that harm will come to the employees themselves in three respects, at least: First, that in many instances they will be compelled to discontinue their work at a distance from their homes, and that expense and discomfort will be incurred as a consequence. In the next place, it shows that in some instances their pay will be considerably reduced, because of this new order that is to be entered upon without warning to the railroads of the country; and, in the third place, it shows that it will require a very largely increased equipment on the part of some of the railroad companies of the country that they at least ought to be permitted time to adjust before they are compelled to give the additional service.

As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, it seems to me that this is unnecessary, if it be not pernicious, legislation; and I trust that the Senate will pause and ask itself the serious question, whether it is not the duty of this body to let this matter rest a little while, at least until it can be more thoroughly inquired into than I apprehend the average Senator has had opportunity of doing.

I received a communication a few days ago from a gentleman well known in railroad circles—and I am one Senator, Mr. President, who does not hesitate to speak the word "railroad" and to quote the opinions of railroad men. I know of no class of men in this country so well qualified to give expert testimony on questions relating to the great carrying corporations of this country as the men who are connected with them; and while some of them have doubtless been guilty of practices that we would all condemn, and while there is a prejudice abroad in the land against corporations as a whole just now, I do not hesitate to be influenced to some extent, at least, by the opinions of these men who have given their lives to a study of the transportation problem, and who are prepared, because of that fact, to enlighten the minds of some men who occupy a place even in the Senate of the United States. This gentleman, in writing, makes this statement:

I believe the evil effects of such a law would be more pronounced in the Far West than on eastern lines.

And that is doubtless true. Mr. Newcomb has shown that it will have a bad effect on the Delaware and Hudson Company, and it is barely possible that it will have a bad effect on the New England roads, although I have some question in my mind about that, but it is certain to injuriously affect the roads in the western States.

I believe—

He says—

the evil effects of such a law would be more pronounced in the Far West than on eastern lines. The traffic in the West is subject to very great fluctuations from month to month, and as all train and enginemen are paid on mileage basis it is impossible to keep a sufficient number of men in the service during the light months to protect the traffic offered during the heavy months, because such a large number of men could not make a living, and would not, therefore, remain idle, or partially idle, during the light months. During the grain season, when all the farmers offer their grain for shipment at once, if the hours of labor are limited as suggested, we shall be unable to move this traffic even as promptly as we do at present, which, as you know, has not always been satisfactory. It would cause idleness of a considerable number of engines while the crews are waiting for rest. It would, in many cases, require live stock to be held in the cars while the crew is taking a rest between terminals or until a new crew could be sent out to make the relief.

While it may be that the legislative committees of the various labor organizations have approved some such action as this, I do not believe their representatives would approve these bills as drawn, because if such bills are passed it will, in many cases, deprive these men of their right to take their layover at their home station; in fact, it would, in many cases, require that they be stopped for rest within a few miles of their homes.

We already have agreements with these organizations of employees which permits them to take rest at a terminal whenever they feel the necessity of such rest, and regardless of the time on the road. We also have agreements permitting them to call for rest on the road between terminals after sixteen hours whenever they feel it necessary to do so. It is needless to say that they very seldom take advantage of the latter privilege, because in most cases when the sixteen-hour period expires they are so near their home station that it would be a detriment to them to stop; but if such a law were passed it would not be optional with them and would result in tying up many crews just outside of their home terminal.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the railroad corporations of this country, between whom and their employees, as a rule, the most agreeable conditions exist, desire to overwork their men or to unfit them for the performance of their very exacting and responsible duties, and I think it must be a very rare exception that such requirements are imposed upon the men by the railroad corporations. Undoubtedly there have been extreme cases. It may be that the case cited by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] on yesterday, where a man, after sixteen or eighteen hours of continuous labor, laid down on the track or beside the track and was killed by a locomotive may have happened; and yet, as I then said, it seems inconceivable to me that that case could have resulted as it has been affirmed it did.

Very many times a careful inquiry into a casualty of that kind reveals facts that are not known to the newspaper man who heralds it to the world, and those few isolated instances that have been cited might, after due deliberation and careful inquiry, be made to appear very different from what they have been pictured to be in this and some other debates that we have had during this session of Congress.

That a great many men are killed on American railroads is undoubtedly true, and we all deprecate it. That the percentage is greater than on some of the railroads or, perhaps, on all of the railroads of the continent of Europe is likewise true, and we regret it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. If it will not disturb the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. It is undoubtedly true that the loss of life among passengers is very much heavier in this country than in any country in Europe; but as to the loss of life among trainmen I do not know. I know in England that the deaths of trainmen are not returned in the statistics of the loss of life on railroads, and I should be very glad if the Senator could tell me whether there are statistics in regard to accidents among railroad employees in foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say, Mr. President, that that is a matter that I have not looked up; and on that point I am not prepared to give any information that would be worth giving.

I was about to say that conditions in respect to the railroad business in this country are different from what they are in Europe. A couple of years ago as I came from San Francisco to Washington, a portion of the way over the Rio Grande Railroad, I wondered that any train ever got through in safety. To compare disasters that might occur on that railroad with disasters that might occur on railroads traversing the level countries of Europe would be, of course, not a fair comparison.

It may be that our impetuosity as a nation and the bustle and push and aggressiveness that characterize the American people may have much more to do with these railroad accidents than the fact that the crews are overworked. I know that some disasters, very serious in their nature, have occurred of late, that have been cited as an illustration of the fact that we are not exercising due care in the direction that this bill proposes to effect a reform, that have been explained as being due to entirely different causes. I will call attention to one instance before I get through.

If this bill is to pass, Mr. President—and it would be a rash suggestion on my part to say that it will not, because the epidemic is abroad in the land and I do not know any way of stemming the tide until, like measles, it is exhausted—I say if this bill is to pass there are some amendments which certainly ought to be incorporated in it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] yesterday suggested certain amendments which he intends to offer to the bill, and I will now take occasion to suggest certain others, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will give them careful and unprejudiced consideration.

I shall move, on page 4, lines 1 and 2, to strike out the words "casualty occurring after such employee has started on his trip" and insert instead thereof the words "unavoidable accident, or act of God, or resulting from a cause not known to the carrier or its agent in charge of such employee at the time he left the terminal." If that amendment shall be agreed to, and I trust it will be, it will very greatly improve this bill, and at the proper time I will offer it, and possibly submit some observations concerning it.

I shall also, at the proper time, move to strike out, on page 4, line 4, and page 4, line 16, the words "for rest" and insert the words "off duty." "For rest" has no special meaning. "Off duty" has a meaning that all can understand, and I think this slight change will make a great improvement.

On page 4, line 18, after the words "officers or agents," unless the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] shall be adopted, and possibly it is a better amendment than mine——

Mr. FORAKER. What is it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am about to state it. On page 4, line 18, after the words "officers or agents," I had proposed to offer an amendment inserting the words "or employee, knowingly." I say possibly the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio is a better one. I will examine it, which I have not had time to do.

The suggestion was made yesterday that the penalty clause should be amended so that it will read "a penalty of not more than $1,000." I have no objection to that, although the reason which was given did not appeal to me. That was that we ought to grade penalties according to the ability of the offender to pay them. I think that would be bad legislation. If a crime is committed it ought to be punished, and if the crime is committed by a poor man it ought to be punished precisely as it would be punished if committed by a rich man. If committed by an employee it should be punished exactly as if committed by an officer of the corporation. But the tendency is to punish one class more severely than another, and I have no particular objection to that amendment if it shall be offered.

I shall likewise, at the proper time, propose an amendment, on page 5, line 2, after the word "occurred," by inserting the words:

> But no such suit shall be brought after the expiration of one year from the date of such violation.

I will also offer to amend it by inserting at the close of the bill the following words:

> Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to crews of wrecking or relief trains.

I may perhaps offer some other amendments, but I wish to call attention at this time to the amendments I have enumerated, with a view of having the Senate give them a little thought, and in the hope that they may not be resisted by any Senator.

A friend of mine, not a railroad man, not connected with any railroad, under date of June 14, honored me by calling my attention to this bill, and he more particularly dwelt upon the fact that the words "or employee knowingly" should be inserted in the bill. He pointed out that it was unfair to hold a corporation accountable for accidents that occurred without the knowledge or possible knowledge of any officer of the corporation, but which did occur because of fault on the part of an employee. On that point he says:

> It would be unfair to the officers and agents of the railroad to make them liable to misdemeanor, unless they knowingly violate the provisions of this act; as in the recent case in Colorado, for example, where a telegraph operator and agent of the road wanted to go to an entertainment and induced an operator who had been on duty at a local station to act for him during the night, thus doubling his duty. This was unknown to all agents of the company, except the party who was guilty of the offense.

That particular case has been made a great deal of, and it has been asserted over and over again in the public prints that that employee of the road had been so overworked, that he had been on duty so many hours, that he fell asleep, or something else happened to him, and that horrible disaster occurred as a consequence. I have reason to believe that exactly what my correspondent says occurred did occur—by the operator's own act. Having gone to an entertainment, he allowed another employee to take his place, and the accident was not due at all to the fact that the responsible employee had been overworked.

It is equally important, in my judgment—

Says my correspondent—

if such legislation is to pass, that the penalty for violating this act, as shown in the case to which I have above referred, be to make the employee liable criminally as well as the agent. It is just as much an offense for him to violate the act knowingly as it would be for the agent of the road, and in many instances the violation would occur without any superior officer of the company knowing or permitting the violation. If the object is to protect the public as a police regulation, then the penalty should be imposed upon the employee who violates the provision of the act just as well as upon the officers of the company, for many of these employees are not directly under the supervision of any superior officer.

Mr. President, I have said that I do not believe that railroad corporations as a rule deliberately overwork their employees, but it is a well-known fact—one which does not need argument, one which certainly does not need elaboration—that the operation of railroad trains is a peculiar and exacting and perplexing matter, and that there may be, and doubtless have been and will be, a great many instances when it will be necessary for the welfare, not only of the traveling public, but the corporations and the employees themselves, to ask men to work what is usually regarded as an extreme length of time. For myself I accounted it a great privilege to work during a large portion of my life more than sixteen hours a day. But I do not argue that any other man ought to do that. But I do argue that if there is a full agreement, an amicable arrangement, between the men operating our railroads and the men employed upon the railroads that the latter shall work under certain conditions what is ordinarily regarded an undue length of time, it is questionable whether the Congress of the United States ought to step in and by legislation compel a different order of things.

In my judgment, if this bill shall be enacted it will inevitably result in producing friction between the railroad managers and their employees which does not now exist, and instead of bettering the condition of the employees it will result in detriment to them. I do not believe, Mr. President, that any interference on our part in this direction will have the least earthly effect upon lessening disasters upon the great railroads of our country.

That is all I care to say now, Mr. President. At the proper time I shall offer the amendments I have suggested, and I may have a word to say in favor of their adoption.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I had yielded the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it the object of this legislation to protect the employees solely, or is it to protect the traveling public?

Mr. GALLINGER. I stated a moment ago that I did not believe the proposed law would result in protecting to any great extent the employees, the traveling public, or the corporations themselves. I apprehend that those who are urging this legislation will say that primarily this is in the interest of the traveling public, but I have not been at all persuaded that it will have that effect.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me again. If it is not in the interest of the traveling public, and the Senator believes in the eight-hour law, as I presume every orthodox Republican does, why is it at all difficult to declare by law that no corporation shall compel or allow any of its employees to work more than sixteen consecutive hours?

Mr. GALLINGER. If any man had imposed, by law or otherwise, a limit on me, so far as the hours I should work were concerned, for twenty-five years of my life, I would have considered him the worst enemy I had in the world.

Mr. TILLMAN. So would I. How about any man who would impose sixteen hours on you because of your——

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never yet found that man, and I have had something to do with getting a living under conditions quite as burdensome as those of any railroad employee or any Senator present to-day.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only interested in such legislation as appears to be necessary to secure the safety of the people and at the same time will protect the necessitous employees against the greed of any railroad or anybody else.

I should like to ask the Senator who introduced this measure and who has the matter in charge to consider the question of striking out, on page 4, lines 10 and 11, the words which I will indicate. I hope he will look at it. I hope he will agree to strike out, after "employee," the words:

Engaged in or connected with the movement of any train by which such commerce is affected.

And simply say, "it shall be unlawful * * * to require or permit an employee to remain on duty more than sixteen hours," without regard to whether he is connected with the train or not. Those words are a little ambiguous. It looks to me as though sixteen hours are sufficient. Senators will remember that a great many of the accidents which we hear about—I have read of them—are caused by the telegraph operator who is compelled to sit up and try to keep tab on the movement of trains. He goes to sleep and does not flag a train under the orders, and the train rushes by and meets some other train on the road. I believe the telegraph operator ought to be protected just as much as anybody else. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will consider the propriety of making that change, and provide that employees shall not work more than sixteen hours under any conditions, without any limitation whatever.

HARBOR AT SOUTH HAVEN, MICH.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me to make a report from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield for a moment, provided it does not provoke debate.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it will.

I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 178) providing for the improvement of the harbor at South Haven, Mich., to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Wisconsin rise and take the floor?

Mr. NELSON. I had the floor. I did not take the Senator from Wisconsin off the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read at length for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to expend such sum as may be necessary, not exceeding $10,000, out of any appropriation heretofore made, for improving the harbor at South Haven, Mich., for the purpose of dredging said harbor to a depth of 16 feet in accordance with a report submitted in House Document No. 119, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. BURKETT. That reads peculiarly—"out of any appropriation heretofore made." Does it not specify it any closer than that?

Mr. NELSON. It refers to the appropriation previously made for that harbor.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not observe that.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOURS OF LABOR OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I merely want to ask the Senator, before he commences his remarks, so that I may not have to interrupt him, to be kind enough to tell us what is intended by the provision to which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] called attention, commencing in line 9, on page 4, after the word "hauled," and extending down to and including the word "affected," as follows:

Or to require or permit any employee engaged in or connected with the movement of any train by which such commerce is affected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is intended to include in the language just quoted by the Senator from Ohio all train crews, switchmen, train dispatchers, telegraph operators, and all those who have anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the movement of trains.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I suggest to the Senator that he ought to make it so clear and unmistakable that there can be no mistake about it, that telegraph operators and switchmen and everybody else are included. Otherwise it might be construed as simply applying to those in charge of the train or on it, as the engineer, fireman, conductor, flagman, and all such employees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course the difficulty of making an enumeration is that if any class of employees is omitted——

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand. If you do not mention one class they will be regarded as expressly omitted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; the omission of any one class when you begin to enumerate them would be construed as excluding those not named. It was regarded by those who framed the bill, I suppose, that this phraseology was safer and would be certain to embrace all who had to do with the movement of trains in any manner.

Mr. TILLMAN. "Who have to do in any manner directly or indirectly with the movement of trains." The Senator used those words. I find they are not in the bill—connected directly or indirectly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There ought to be no objection to including the words "directly or indirectly."

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely make the suggestion to the Senator because I want to see that this legislation is effective and will accomplish the purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I want to see the bill as broad and comprehensive and, at the same time, as specific as it can be made. I regret very much that it is not a stronger measure. I introduced a bill which I should much prefer to have supported than the bill now pending before the Senate, although I subsequently introduced this bill at the request of the legislative representative of the organizations of railway employees, because he believed that it would not be possible to secure the enactment of a better measure at this session.

Mr. President, every Senator who has spoken against this bill insists that there is no necessity for this legislation. I can not understand the point of view of anyone conversant at all with the accidents, the loss of life, and the injuries which occur not only to the employees, but to the traveling public in this country—I say, I can not understand what objection anyone who has even a superficial knowledge or acquaintance with the great loss of life in this country and the injury to passengers can make to this bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] inquired of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] as to the statistics respecting the loss of life on foreign roads. The Senator from New Hampshire was not prepared to answer the Senator from Massachusetts. I have at hand some comparisons with Prussian and English railroads which will at least in part answer the Senator from Massachusetts.

In Prussia the railroad companies employ a greater number of men relatively to operate their trains and care for their tracks than do the railroad companies of this country. The railroads in this country kill relatively three times as many employees as are killed on Prussian roads. In this country the railroads injure relatively five times as many employees as are injured on Prussian roads. These figures are taken from a recent report made by the representatives of the Prussian government, who were commissioned to visit this country and investigate the American railways and their operation. The figures which I have quoted from that report are based upon comparisons which take into account all factors necessary to make the results accurate and reliable. There is therefore no escape from the damaging conclusions of this report. It makes an appalling arraignment of the railway management of this country.

Now, Mr. President, with respect to passengers, the representatives of the Prussian government state in this report that American railroads kill relatively six times as many passengers as the Prussian roads, and injure twenty-nine times as many passengers as the Prussian roads.

With respect to railway accidents upon English roads, I have some interesting comparisons bearing directly upon the question raised by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I read from a message which, as governor, I submitted to the Wisconsin legislature one year ago:

> England has a little over 22,000 miles of railroad. We have in this country a little more than 200,000 miles of railway. England has, therefore, about one-tenth of the railway mileage of the United States. Her passenger trains in 1903 traveled less than one-half the total mileage which the passenger trains in this country traveled. English railroads, however, carried twice as many passengers as were carried by the railroads of the United States during that year. It will thus be seen that the English trains were much more heavily loaded and followed each other much more closely in order to handle on her limited trackage the passenger traffic for 1903.
> It is an accepted rule that accidents increase in some measure with the density of traffic. The density of the English traffic compared with that of this country is as six to one. But, notwithstanding the fact that England hauled twice as many passengers with a train mileage less than half as great as ours, and did the work with only 22,000 miles of track, she killed and injured in 1903 only one-tenth of the number killed and injured by the railroads of this country for that year.

There is another important matter reported to the Prussian government by their representatives sent to this country, to which I ask the attention of the Senate, and that is this: The Prussian government employs to guard against accidents upon the railroads operated by that government 636,000 men, as against 50,000 men employed for similar purposes by the railroads of this country.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that these comparisons ought to plead strongly for this legislation. Add to this the startling disclosures revealed in the reports which the railroads file annually with the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing that over 50,000 people, including railway employees and passengers, are killed and injured in the United States every twelve months by railroads, and it would seem that no Senator ought to question the necessity of this legislation or attribute it to an epidemic of pernicious discrimination against railroads or a disposition upon the part of anybody to do them wrong.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says he does not know how it will be possible to stem the tide of this epidemic of railway legislation until it has had its run, like the measles. I would suggest to him that the best way to arrest it is to deal fairly with the public in its relations with the railroads.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In one moment. If there is an aroused public sentiment for legislative action at this time, it is because the public interest has been so long neglected.

For nearly ten years the people have been knocking at the doors of Congress, asking for legislation to regulate transportation charges upon railroads doing interstate-commerce business in this country. There have been laid before the committees of Congress annually, by the Interstate Commerce Commission in their reports, the fact that the railroad companies of this country were increasing month by month and year by year the transportation charges upon the traffic of the country; that this was being done through a combination and concerted action on the part of the great trunk lines; that over large areas of the country the increase in rates would be made upon the same day and in exactly the same ratio, showing that all the lines operated within a particular section were acting together—were cooperating in the advance of rates.

The reports of the Commission, the testimony presented to the committees of Congress, and the petitions of thousands of people and hundreds of communities have placed it beyond dispute that these advances were extortionate and without excuse or justification.

It has been made plain to the committees of Congress that these advances have been in violation of the economic laws governing the cost of transportation; that with the increase in the volume of traffic and the improvement in the facilities of transportation the rates should have been lowered instead of raised.

In the face of all this, the just demands for legislation have been denied for a decade. It is only at the present session that public pressure has become so strong that Congress has at last granted a little measure of relief for the regulation of railway rates.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield presently, when I have answered the Senator's argument with respect to the epidemic.

The righteous appeals of the railway employees have been ignored and denied.

For nearly twenty-five years they have prayed for legislation to protect them against the negligence of the railway companies. The railway service is under the severest discipline. Employees are compelled to serve with the men the company hires. They can not choose their associates. To offer any objection is to invite discharge. They suffer loss of life and limb in that service through the carelessness of coemployees and the negligence of the railway companies.

For nearly a quarter of a century they sought relief from Congress in vain. Is it to be marveled that the public is awakening to a sense of the wrong it has suffered? Shall its persistent and perfectly fair and reasonable demand for just legislation be rebuked as clamor and disease?

Every country in the world has recognized the demand for legislation that will make the employer respond in damages for the carelessness of the company and negligence or carelessness of the coemployee through whom an employee of the company receives injury. Yet the railroad employees of this country suffered without remedy until the present session, when a reasonably good bill passed this Congress after a protracted struggle to defeat it.

So with the present bill. The railway employees have asked again and again for legislation placing a reasonable limit upon the number of hours of continued service beyond which they shall not be required to run trains. It is argued here that it can be left to contract between the railway companies and their employees. Every man who is at all familiar with the relations existing between railway employees and the companies knows perfectly well that whenever an engineer is called to take out his engine, whenever the call is made upon the train crew, no matter whether they have been on duty to the limit of human endurance, with scarcely an hour's rest, they must respond to that call. They can not argue the matter with the railroad company. They can not refuse to go out.

Of course they will not be discharged at once for such refusal. That would be a violation of the contract. But the refusal is noted on the record of such employee by the train dispatcher. Within a month or two, for some reason that can not be construed to be a violation of the contract entered into between the employee and the railroad company, the employee finds himself dismissed from the services, and dismissed under conditions that will not admit of his procuring employment with other companies.

The service of the railroad companies is in many respects a most difficult one. It is hazardous. It is a service in which the public is profoundly interested. This legislation is demanded because it is just to a faithful, intelligent, and courageous army of men and reasonable in its terms.

Furthermore, it is demanded because the public is deeply interested. It is vital to all who travel that the men who operate the railway trains of this country are in the best physical and mental condition. With scarcely an exception, every afternoon as the hands of the clock point to the hour of 5 some Senator rises to entreat those in charge of legislation for an adjournment. They find themselves weary and exhausted with their attendance upon the session for a scant five hours. The RECORD is full of the complaints of Senators that they have been required to sit here through half the day.

Think, sir, of the engineer, who takes out an engine at midnight for his long run. His employment may not be so exacting as that of Senators on this floor, but the alertness demanded, the concentration of all his faculties, is what wears upon the man. That engineer sits with hand on lever and throttle peering ahead, with all the faculties of his mind and all the powers of his being concentrated on the safe conduct of that train to its destination. He has not only the strain which comes of nervous tension, of a constant apprehension of danger, but he has the weariness which comes with physical taxation. So with the firemen; so with the conductors. When those men have been on duty continuously for sixteen hours, how can any Senator argue that the law ought not fix a limitation beyond which they shall not be required to serve?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. I want the Senator from Wisconsin to conclude what he is saying, because I have something that I want to say to the Senate, and I must go to a committee meeting. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator rose to address me a question, I yield.

Mr. HALE. It is only a matter of reading a conference report.

Mr. BAILEY. A committee is now waiting on me, and I am awaiting the Senator from Wisconsin. I should like to dispose of what I desire to say as soon as possible. I hope the Senator from Maine will not insist now upon interrupting the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. I am only doing what is always done. I have a very important conference report to submit. It will not take any time. I conferred with the Senator from Wisconsin before his bill came up, and instead of bringing it in at that time, I told him I would wait and ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside while I submitted a report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. It is very important, of course, that it should go through. There are no controversies in it. It is simply a matter of reading the report. All I ask is that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside while I submit the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. Both Senators will see how important this is. I shall not myself take any time. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that I may submit a conference report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Texas does not object, I will not.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say that if the pending bill is coming to a vote at once when the Senator finishes, I shall have no objection, but I am going to interrupt anything else at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. HALE. I shall not take any time, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine submits a conference report.

"JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

"SEC. 10. That there shall be exhibited at the Jamestown Exposition by the Government of the United States from the Smithsonian Institution, the National Museum, and the Library of Congress such articles and materials of an historical nature as will serve to impart a knowledge of our colonial and national history; and such Government exhibit shall also include an exhibit from the War and Navy Departments, the Life-Saving Service, the Revenue-Cutter Service, the Army, the Navy, the Light-House Service, the Bureau of Fisheries, and an exhibit from the island of Porto Rico. And the Bureau of American Republics is hereby invited to make an exhibit illustrative of the resources and international relations of the American Republics, and space in any of the United States Government exhibit buildings shall be provided for that purpose. The Jamestown Tercentennial Commission, created by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, shall, in addition to the authority and duties conferred and imposed by said act, be authorized and empowered, and it shall be their duty, to select, prepare, transport, and arrange for the exhibition and return of the Government exhibits herein authorized. In addition to the articles and materials which the said Jamestown Tercentennial Commission may select for exhibition as aforesaid, the President of the United States may, in his discretion, designate other and additional articles and materials.

"The officers and employees of the Government who may be appointed by the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission to carry out the provisions of this section, and any officers and employees of the Government who may be detailed to assist them, including the officers of the Army and Navy, shall receive no compensation in addition to their regular salaries, but they shall be allowed their actual and necessary traveling expenses, together with a per diem in lieu of subsistence not to exceed four dollars.

"The officers of the Army and Navy shall receive said allowance in lieu of subsistence and mileage now allowed by law, and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, in their discretion, detail retired Army and Navy officers for such duty. Any provision of law which may prohibit the detail of persons in the employ of the United States to other service than that which they customarily perform shall not apply to persons detailed to duty in connection with said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition. And to carry out in full all of the provisions of this section not herein otherwise specifically appropriated for, so much thereof as may be necessary is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended in accordance with law and under such rules and regulations as the said Jamestown Tercentennial Commission may prescribe.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause suitable buildings to be erected on the site of the said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition for said Government exhibit, including a suitable building for the exhibit of the United States Life-Saving Service; a fisheries building, including an aquarium; also a building for use as a place of rendezvous for the soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy and of the foreign navies and armies participating in said celebration; also a building for use as a place of rendezvous for the commissioned naval and Army officers participating in said celebration; also the preparation of the grounds for, the approaches thereto, and the lighting of all of said buildings. Said buildings shall be erected, as far as practicable, on the colonial style of architecture from plans prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to contract for said buildings in the same manner and under the same regulations as for other public buildings of the United States: Provided, That the aggregate cost of all of said buildings, including the preparation of grounds, approaches, and lighting shall in no event exceed the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. At the close of the exposition the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to dispose of said buildings or the materials composing the same, and of the piers which are provided for in this act, or the materials thereof, giving preference to the Jamestown Exposition Company to the extent that it shall have the option to purchase the same at an appraised value to be ascertained in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine.

"That to the end that free and ready communication between the ships and the shore may be had, and in order to furnish ample and safe harbor for the small craft necessary to convey the soldiers and exposition visitors from the grounds to the fleet, there shall be constructed, from plans to be furnished by the Jamestown Exposition Company and approved by the Secretary of War, two piers, extending from the exposition grounds into the waters of Hampton Roads, the ends of said piers to be surmounted with towers for the exhibit, if practicable, of the Light-House Service and wireless telegraph service. Said piers shall be connected by an arch sufficiently high to permit small craft to enter under it into a basin or harbor, which shall be dredged to a sufficient depth to accommodate boats drawing not more than 10 feet of water at mean low tide. And the Secretary of War is directed to contract for the construction of said piers and basin in the same manner and under the same regulations as for public structures of the United States, but the contract price shall not exceed the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, or as much thereof as may be necessary, which sum is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That before the appropriation made by this section shall become available the Jamestown Exposition Company shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury an agreement that it will, at its own expense, operate and manage said piers and basin during the period of the exposition, and that it will, at its own expense, illuminate the same: Provided further, That all small craft attached to any naval vessel of this or any foreign country, whose fleet is in the waters of Hampton Roads to participate in the celebration, shall have access to and use of said basin and piers for the purpose of communication with the exposition grounds without any charge therefor and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe: Provided further, That the same right of access and use of said basin and piers during the exposition shall be, and is hereby, reserved to the United States, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to impose upon the United States any obligation to maintain or keep in repair such piers or basin or approaches thereto or to reimburse any individual or corporation for any damage sustained in consequence of the use of said piers and basin.

"That in aid of the said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Tresury not otherwise appropriated, which sum shall be paid to the Jamestown Exposition Company upon satisfactory evidence being furnished the Secretary of the Treasury that the said company has expended the sum of five hundred thousand dollars on account of said exposition. Said two hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon vouchers and satisfactory evidence that it has been expended for the purposes of the exposition other than salaries: Provided, That, as a condition precedent to the payment of this appropriation in aid of said exposition, the Jamestown Exposition Company shall agree to close the grounds of said exposition to visitors on Sunday during the period of said exposition.

"That for the erection of a permanent landing pier at Jamestown Island on the frontage owned by the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, the precise location to be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and said association and to be donated by said association to the United States, the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The Secretary of War is directed to contract for the construction of said pier in the same manner and under the same requirements as for public structures of the United States: Provided, however, That if any pier now constructed and suitable for landing persons and material for the erection of the monument on said Jamestown Island heretofore authorized can be leased or purchased within the appropriation of $15,000 hereby made, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend the sum hereby appropriated for the leasing or purchase of said pier and of a sufficient and proper amount of land adjacent thereto to give free access to the grounds owned by such Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities and the monument to be erected thereon under the provisions of an act approved March 3, 1905.

"For the policing during the exposition period of the grounds owned by the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, upon Jamestown Island, and for erecting thereon suitable retiring rooms and rest stations for the visiting public, and for providing drinking water at suitable places thereon, and for such benches and other accommodations as visitors to such island will need, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The moneys appropriated by this paragraph shall be expended by and under the direction of the Tercentennial Commission, and shall not be expended until such provisions are made with such association as will insure the free access to every part of the grounds of said association of all visitors who may come during the period of the said exposition, and will insure free access always to that part of the grounds upon which said monument is located.

"That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty shall be admitted free of the payment of such duty, customs, fees, or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; but it shall be lawful at any time during the exposition to sell, for delivery at the close thereof, any goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on the grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption or use in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed upon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of withdrawal, and on articles which shall have suffered diminution or deterioration from incidental handling and necessary exposure the duty, if paid, shall be assessed according to the appraised value at the time of withdrawal for consumption or use, and the penalties prescribed by law shall be enforced against any person guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal: Provided further, That nothing in this section contained shall be construed as an invitation, express or implied, from the Government of the United States to any foreign government, state, municipality, corporation, partnership, or individual to import any such articles for the purpose of exhibition at the said exposition.

"That medals with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition and of the awards to be made to the exhibitors thereat and to successful contestants in aquatic and other contests shall be prepared for the Jamestown Exposition Company by the Secretary of the Treasury at some mint of the United States, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1893, upon the payment by the Jamestown Exposition Company of a sum equal to the cost thereof; and authority may be given by the Secretary of the Treasury to the holder of a medal properly awarded to him to have duplicates thereof made at any of the mints of the United States from gold, silver, or bronze upon the payment by him for the same of a sum equal to the cost thereof.

"That in aid of the Negro Development and Exposition Company of the United States of America to enable it to make an exhibit of the progress of the negro race in this country at the said exposition, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This sum shall be expended by the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission under rules and regulations prescribed by it and for such objects as shall be approved by both the said Negro Development and Exposition Company of the United States of America and the said Commission: Provided, however, That a reasonable proportion of said appropriation shall be expended for a building within which to make such exhibit.

"That except to the extent and in the manner by this act provided and authorized the United States Government shall not be liable on any account whatever in connection with the said exposition, and nothing in this act shall be construed so as to create any liability upon the part of the United States Government, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, or for any claim for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support of or in liquidation of any debts or obligations created by said Tercentennial Commission, or any other board, commission, or any person or persons whomsoever, acting or claiming to act by authority of this act in excess of the appropriations provided for by this act.

"The United States shall in no event be liable, directly or indirectly, upon any ground or for any cause whatsoever in connection with or on account of its participation in said Jamestown Tercentennial Exposition beyond the sums expressly appropriated by the act of March third, 1905, and by this act.

"That all moneys appropriated by this act which the Jamestown Tercentennial Commission is authorized to expend shall be drawn out of the Treasury in such manner and under such regulations as such Commission may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; and at the close of the exposition period, and after the work of such Commission is completed, such Commission shall make a complete report of their actions hereunder and a complete statement of all expenditures for each of the purposes herein specified to the President of the United States for transmission to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have read as a part of my remarks a letter which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks that the letter presented by him may be read by the Secretary. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 14, 1906.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith the bill regarding which I talked with you personally some days ago, entitled "A bill to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon," and which has the indorsement of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, Order of Railway Conductors, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. We would appreciate it very much if you can find it consistent to introduce this bill for us. Earnest efforts have been made by these organizations to prevent excessive hours of service of employees engaged in the movement of trains through agreements with the various railroad managements without the necessity of legislation, but have not been sufficiently successful to properly protect life and limb in this way, and we think it only proper to appeal to Congress for protection.

Very truly, yours,

H. R. FULLER,
Legislative Representative.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will ask to have read a telegram and letter, which I send to the desk, as bearing upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The telegram reads as follows:

BLUEFIELD, W. VA., June 27.

Senator LA FOLLETTE, Washington, D. C.:

The Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers earnestly protest against Foraker amendment penalizing employees in House service bill. We hope you will do all possible to defeat it.

W. S. STONE.

(NOTE.—This man is grand chief engineer of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.)

The SECRETARY (continuing). The letter reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 27, 1906.

Hon. R. M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the amendment offered by Senator FORAKER to Senate bill No. 5133, by which it is proposed to penalize an employee for working more than the specified number of hours, the organizations of railroad employees are opposed to such an amendment.

The carrier creates the conditions, and it is to it that the Government should look for the safe transportation of persons and property. No employee in train service works excessive hours without the carrier knowing it, as a record is kept—or should be kept—showing the time the employees go on or are relieved from duty; and it is therefore impossible for an employee to deceive the carrier as to the time he has been off or on duty.

The adoption of such an amendment would in many cases defeat the purpose of the act for the reason that it would prevent the Government from using the employee as a witness, as he could not be compelled to incriminate himself.

To those acquainted with the practical operation of a railroad it is easily seen that such a provision could be used to defeat the law in this way: A train dispatcher, who is the person responsible for the prompt movement of trains, could, in order to cover up his own shortcomings and mistakes which had caused delay to trains, get the employees within a few miles of their homes within the maximum time, and knowing the great temptation for the men to get home, would say to them that he did not know how long they had been on duty, and influence them to stretch the time sufficiently to enable them to reach their homes. It would encourage this practice, which would have the effect of delay rather than an effort to move trains with dispatch.

Very truly, yours,

H. R. FULLER, Legislative Representative.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to read just a few lines from the message of the President to Congress the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. He said:

I * * * would also point out to the Congress the urgent need of legislation in the interest of the public safety, limiting the hours of labor for railroad employees in train service upon railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

In his message at the present session he said:

The excessive hours of labor to which railroad employees in train service are in many cases subjected is also a matter which may well engage the serious attention of the Congress. The strain, both mental and physical, upon those who are engaged in the movement and operation of railroad trains under modern conditions is perhaps greater than that which exists in any other industry, and if there are any reasons for limiting by law the hours of labor in any employment they certainly apply with peculiar force to the employment of those upon whose vigilance and alertness in the performance of their duties the safety of all who travel by rail depends.

I shall offer, Mr. President, at the proper time some amendments to the bill which I believe will improve it but still keep it within the limits of the manifest intention of the committee which reported it. But I will now yield the floor to the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. MCLAURIN subsequently submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon; which were ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

First amendment.—Immediately after the word "employee," in line 3 and in line 15, on page 4, insert the following, to wit: "having been so on duty for sixteen consecutive hours immediately before."

Second amendment.—Immediately after the word "rest," in line 4 and in line 16, on page 4, add the following, to wit: "Any such employee who shall have been on duty ten successive hours shall not be required or permitted to go on duty without having had at least eight hours' rest."

Third amendment.—Insert: "Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, which by the negligence of its employee worked overtime shall injure or damage any person, shall be liable, by suit and recovery, in either a State or United States court, to such person so injured or damaged for all damages so sustained."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently submitted six amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon; which were ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

1. Amend by inserting, after the word "trip," in line 2, page 4, the following: "or by unknown casualty occurring before he started on his trip."
2. Amend by inserting, after the word "employee," at the end of line 3, page 4, the following: "who has been on duty sixteen hours."
3. Amend by inserting, after the word "rest," at the end of line 4, page 4, the following: "or to require or permit any such employee who has been on duty ten and less than sixteen hours to go on duty without having had at least eight hours for rest."
4. Amend by inserting, after the word "employee," in line 15, page 4, the following: "who has been on duty sixteen hours."
5. Amend by inserting, after the word "rest," in line 16, page 4, the following: "or to require or permit any such employee who has been on duty ten and less than sixteen hours to go on duty without having at least eight hours for rest."
6. After the word "knowledge," line 6, page 5, add the following: "The provision of this act shall not apply to relief or wreck trains."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, to be misunderstood by some good men and to be misrepresented by many bad men is a penalty which every man must pay for actively participating in the politics of this free Republic; and it would be worse than a waste of time for any Senator to answer all of the unfounded and malicious charges which may be circulated against him. I am, moreover, inclined to believe that the rule pursued by nearly all public men of making no answer to any charge is the wiser one, because if some are answered and others are left unanswered the very fact that an answer has been made to some and not to others will be used as an evidence that the unanswered ones are true. For this reason an answer must be made to all or to none; and as any man would make himself ridiculous by asking the public to listen while he corrects every story which the ingenuity of personal and political malevolence may invent, the only safe rule is to trust an intelligent public to judge him by what he says and does without reference to what he is charged with having done or said. But the fact that the publication which contains the false and offensive matter to which I object is owned by a Member of Congress seems to take this case out of the general rule and to demand the answer which I am about to make.

I shall not deal with this as a matter personal to me, because it is of a kind which, if dealt with in that way, would require a different place. Indeed, if I considered it purely and only from a personal point of view, I would not regard it as worthy of any notice; for nothing which this magazine can say will injure me with my constituents or in the estimation of those with whom I have served in either House of Congress. But, Mr. President, I can not free myself from the belief that I owe it to the American people to show them what manner of men these are who are striving to destroy popular faith in the integrity of all public servants.

Several months ago the Cosmopolitan Magazine, which I am informed was up to that time a reputable publication, fell into financial difficulties, and was sold to WILLIAM R. HEARST. As I state this upon information and not upon my own knowledge, I think it proper to lay before the Senate the facts as they were furnished to me by a gentleman familiar with the transaction. In a letter to me upon the subject that gentleman says:

The proposition to sell being satisfactory to the creditors, negotiations were entered into with W. R. HEARST, who agreed to buy the magazine. HEARST was represented in the arrangement of the sale by one Carvalho.

The purchase price agreed on was $500,000. Instead of paying this sum in cash, HEARST organized a dummy corporation to take over this magazine, and called it the "International Magazine Company," he (HEARST) personally guaranteeing the bonds that were issued in settlement of the outstanding debts and over that of a sum up to the purchase price. The creditors and Walker accepted the bonds of this International Magazine Company at par. They are five-year bonds, drawing interest at the rate of 5 per cent, payable semiannually.

Immediately following this change of ownership this magazine announced a series of sensational articles entitled "The Treason of the Senate." As those articles were deliberately planned and widely advertised, the public had a right to expect that they would be written with scrupulous care and a due regard for truth and justice; but so far from meeting this reasonable expectation, they have been so manifestly designed to prejudice, rather than to inform the public, that intelligent men have laid them aside in absolute disgust. Some readers of less intelligence, however, are inclined to believe them, and I have already heard of some shallow and inflammable minds who support them with the argument that if they were not true they would have been denied. For the sake of the men who desire to know the truth and who would not do even their political enemies an injustice, I have determined to expose the reckless mendacity of the man who writes these articles.

I do not, of course, feel at liberty to refer to what he has said about other Senators, because I must respect their determination to pass his attacks on them in silence, and I am therefore driven to the necessity of using the article in which he slanders me. But before proceeding with that, I feel myself warranted in saying a word about one who was grossly abused, and who was not here then, and who can never be here again to speak in his own defense. While Senator Gorman was confined to his home by the sickness which terminated in his death, he was made the object of a bitter arraignment and pursued even beyond the grave, for in his last article this writer renews his miserable aspersions upon the dead Senator.

It has been observed by every intelligent man who has read these articles that the basic charge which runs through them all is that Democratic and Republican Senators are acting together in a secret agreement, and the unsuspecting reader is asked to believe that this secret agreement is carried out behind closed doors and in committee rooms. It was necessary to impress this view upon the public in order to give the articles even an appearance of the truth, because if it had been said that the Democrats and Republicans cooperate in the open Senate, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD would completely and overwhelmingly refute that charge. It was therefore necessary to first imbue the public mind with the belief that Senators acted one way in the secrecy of the committee room and another way in the open Senate. In accordance with this line of appeal to the suspicions of the people this writer has selected as a special instance to illustrate and establish that charge, the tariff act of 1894, commonly known as the "Wilson bill." He declares, and in order that there may be no mistake about it, I will read exactly what he says:

As usual, ALDRICH and Gorman retired to their Finance Committee with the tariff bill—as the Senate was "Democratic," Gorman had taken the chairmanship of the committee and the leadership of the Senate that goes with it, and ALDRICH had become nominal second in command. All the mischief, all the treachery that was put into that bill in the secrecy of that committee by those slippery twins will never be known; it is impossible for anyone not in the secret to grasp the effect of the sly amendments slipped in here and there.

If the man who wrote that statement had sincerely desired to know the truth, he could have learned it with very little trouble; and if he had been seeking to enlighten those who read his articles, he would not have misled them with a statement like that. Whether he knows the facts and deliberately misstated them, or whether he merely pretended to know them when he did not, he is equally unworthy of belief. Mr. President, when the Wilson bill was under consideration in the Senate, Senator Gorman was not the chairman of the Finance Committee. Indeed, sir, Senator Gorman was not even a member of that committee at that time, nor was he ever a member of it until within the last three years. What must fair-minded men think of a writer who charges that a Senator abused a position in the face of the official record which shows that he did not occupy the position which he is charged with having abused?

Every man who knows anything about tariff legislation knows perfectly well that for many years the practice has been that the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives first make the tariff bill, and only submit it to the full committee after they have completed it. The minority is then permitted to read it and to criticise it; but they are not permitted to change it. The majority being responsible for the bill, make it to suit themselves and take their responsibility before the country. The same course of procedure is followed in the Senate, and neither Senator ALDRICH nor any other Republican Senator was permitted to even see the amendments to the Wilson tariff bill which were agreed upon by the Democratic majority until after they had finished their work. I do not complain that all men do not understand how tariff bills are made, because many good men have not taken the trouble to inform themselves in that respect; but when a man assumes to explain to the people how any particular bill was made he imposes upon himself the double duty of learning the truth and telling it.

Coming to the article in the last issue of this magazine, in which he assails my reputation and public services, he is guilty of even more vicious misrepresentations, if possible, than those he made about Senator Gorman. While he ought to have examined the official list of the Senate committees before attempting to name the chairman of the most important one, he may not have done so, and his misrepresentation, though inexcusable, may not have been intentional. No such extenuation, however, can be offered for his misrepresentation in respect to me, because he read the record which he distinctly misrepresents in some particulars and deliberately suppresses in others. His first accusation against me relates to a matter which was thoroughly investigated by the very legislature which elected me to the Senate, and it was shown to be so entirely unjust and absurd that the decent men among my most implacable enemies in Texas no longer discuss it. In order that the Senate and the country may understand how palpably and how grossly he has misrepresented that episode, I must be pardoned while I briefly recall it. In 1897 or 1898 a foreign corporation then transacting business in our State was convicted of violating that section of our antitrust law which prohibits exclusive contracts, and its permit was revoked. In the spring of 1900 that judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the officers of that corporation then sought to settle with the State by offering to pay whatever penalty might be considered a proper punishment, provided that they could continue their business in Texas. I was asked to intercede in their behalf, and, upon the distinct and positive assurance that the company was an independent one and not controlled by any trust, I advised our State officials to permit it, upon the payment of a fine commensurate with its offense, to continue its business in Texas.

The attorney-general, who was a college mate of mine and a true man in every sense, submitted to me the judgment of the court, and expressed the opinion that he could not, under the terms of that judgment, consent to such a settlement. After carefully examining the judgment I concurred in his opinion, and advised that the only lawful course was to dissolve the offending corporation and organize a new one; but that advice was given upon the understanding that when the new corporation came into the State it should obey our laws. Immediately after that conversation I returned to Washington, and knew absolutely nothing further about the transaction until I read an attack upon the attorney-general in respect to it, when immediately and without the slightest hesitation I defended him, and avowed my responsibility by stating what I had advised. As so often happens in the bitterness of political strife, the circumstance was seized upon and magnified in many ways, and it was charged that I had received a fee ranging from $50,000 to $500,000, according to the imagination of the relater. Finally one man, who was more reckless than the rest and who happened to be a member of the Texas legislature, introduced a resolution directing an inquiry into my connection with the case. Every friend of mine in that legislature, with a single exception, would have voted against that resolution except for my earnest insistence. They contended—and they were right—that there was nothing in the matter which called for an investigation. They pointed out the fact that it was not contended that the matter was connected in the remotest degree with the legislation of Congress, and could not therefore by any possibility involve my official or personal integrity. To all of this my answer was that if the resolution were defeated the lies would multiply and some honest men would be misled into the belief that an inquiry would have revealed some misconduct on my part, and at last my friends in the legislature yielded to my view of the matter and voted for the investigation. A committee was appointed, consisting of four gentlemen who had supported me in my race for the Senate and three who had supported my opponent. That committee unanimously reported to the legislature exonerating me and our State officers from every shadow of an imputation.

Mr. President, it was a case in which there could have been no wrong. Had I chosen to accept employment in that case, I had a perfect right to do so, and I desire the Senate to know that I did not leave that question the subject of any doubt in the minds of that legislature. I told the committee in no spirit of defiance, but merely as a matter of proper self-respect, that I had a right to do all that I was accused of doing; and I will read to the Senate what I said to that committee of the legislature. Here it is:

I desire to have it understood in this connection that had I known that the Waters-Pierce Oil Company would be compelled to dissolve and resort to a legal reincorporation and that they would be pursued in the courts, I would not have hesitated one second about accepting employment from it and taking a fee, provided my labor as their attorney had not taken me from my public duties in Washington.

There could not have been the slightest question about my right to accept a fee to defend them in the courts so long as I believed that they were willing to obey our laws. There could not have been any possibility of their case coming before the body of which I was a member, and therefore neither my vote nor my official conduct could have influenced the decision of it, nor been influenced by their employment of me.

I am a lawyer, and I sincerely hope that I will never be such a political coward as to fear to defend any man or any business when I think their rights are assailed unjustly or with unnecessary severity. Neither am I such a fool as to really want to keep a legitimate business out of the State, nor such a demagogue as to pretend that I do.

With that statement before them, the committee, in the first instance, and the legislature, in the second instance, unanimously exonerated me from any misconduct.

Mr. President, the first misstatement in this magazine article relates to this—no, not the first misstatement, but the first misstatement in it which refers to my public service, relates to this very question of the investigation before the legislature. The writer of this article says:

McFall, however, on January 17, submitted an affidavit to the committee—

Mr. CARMACK. Who is McFall?

Mr. BAILEY. McFall was the member of the legislature who had introduced the resolution of inquiry.

McFall, however, on January 17, submitted an affidavit to the committee. He rehearsed the facts of the Waters-Pierce ejectment from the State and charged—

"That by reason of BAILEY'S influence and personal and political popularity and prestige, they (the Waters-Pierce Company) were enabled by a mere sham of dissolution and reincorporation to continue in business in Texas.

"That the said JOSEPH W. BAILEY did, on or about May 2, 1900, accompany H. C. Pierce, president of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, to Waco for the purpose of holding a consultation with the county attorney of McLennan County, with a view of compromising said suits (the suits were for $105,000 in fines); that the proposition of compromise by said Pierce was $10,000 to the State in full of her claims and the payment of $3,500 to the county attorney as an extra fee for advising the compromise; and that the said BAILEY indorsed said proposition and urged its acceptance."

Mr. President, the Senate has observed that this magazine writer declares that statement to be an affidavit. But any man who has the curiosity to look into the matter will find on page 137 of the house journal of the legislature of Texas, under date of January 21, 1901, the statement from which this magazine quotation is made, and there is not a semblance of an oath to support it.

I attach no particular importance to whether the statement was sworn to or not, because my observation leads me to believe that any man who will tell a lie will swear to it if he thinks it is safe to do so; but I am amazed to learn that a man who pretends to write so carefully as this magazine writer would have us believe he does, not only prints a naked allegation and describes it as an affidavit, but then suppresses a statement in the same report which shows that the man who is said to have made the affidavit declared to the chairman of the committee from his sick bed that he did not know a single fact or circumstance to sustain even that weak charge.

When the man who introduced this resolution was summoned by the committee to appear and sustain his charge, he retired to his home and went to bed, and instead of coming to answer the committee he sent day after day a doctor's certificate that he was unable to come. The committee finally instructed its chairman to go to his home and ascertain whether or not he was really sick. If he were not sick, then they would bring him to the Capitol, and if he were sick and still not too sick to testify they would go to his house and take his statement under oath. In obedience to the committee's instruction, the chairman repaired to the residence of this witness, and here is what the witness told the chairman to say to the committee and what the committee embodied in its report:

After the committee adjourned at noon on the 17th instant the chairman, the Hon. S. J. Hendrick, visited the Hon. D. A. McFall at the home of the latter, to ascertain how soon Mr. McFall would be able to appear before the committee and to testify, and the chairman reported to the full committee that Mr. McFall had requested him to say that it would be useless for the committee to prolong its session for the purpose of awaiting his evidence, because he could not swear to any fact or circumstance that would tend to establish the charges.

Mark you, Mr. President, the committee did not leave him to say whether he could swear to any fact which would establish the charge, but they put the question to him, as they had put it to other witnesses, if he knew any fact or circumstance which would tend to establish the charge, and his answer was that he did not. Yet this magazine writer incorporates the unsupported and unsworn statement of McFall in this article, and describes it as an "affidavit," concealing the fact that the same legislative record from which he took it contained the statement which I have just read in the hearing of the Senate.

This writer next declares, Mr. President, that there was a serious question in the legislature about my exoneration, and he says the final vote was 73 to 41. The final vote on the resolution, it is true, was 73 to 41, but stated in that way it is as misleading as a direct and positive falsehood would be. The truth about it is this: The committee made two reports, a majority report signed by six and a minority report signed by one. But both reports exonerated me and the State officials from all shadow of blame.

The difference was that the majority report, in addition to its exoneration of me, contained a resolution denouncing the liars—some of them were in that legislature—while the minority report, joining the majority in its exoneration of me, protested against the resolution denouncing the men who had calumniated me and the State officials. That was the only difference.

In the same report which this man read—I assume that he read it because he quotes from it, and if he did not read it he is that much more reckless in his work—he found this statement. After the majority report was submitted, they moved to substitute the minority, and on that motion the first vote was taken. Perhaps it is better that I should read the majority and the minority reports. I will not detain the Senate, of course, by reading the entire reports. The majority report concludes in this way:

Whereas the committee of the House of Representatives, appointed to investigate the charges against the Hon. J. W. BAILEY and certain State officials in connection with the readmission of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company into this State, have performed their duty; and

Whereas by the most diligent inquiry they have not been able to find a single fact or circumstance discreditable either to the Hon. J. W. BAILEY or to any State official, but, on the contrary, all of the evidence before said committee completely and overwhelmingly exonerates the Hon. J. W. BAILEY and all State officials from the charges of misconduct: Therefore, be it Resolved by the house of representatives, That we denounce the malicious imputations and insinuations against the integrity of the Hon. J. W. BAILEY and our State officials as the most cruel, vindictive, and unfounded attack ever made upon the character of a faithful public servant in Texas.

The minority report begins as follows:

We, the minority of your committee appointed under the resolution introduced by the Hon. D. A. McFall, and adopted by the house on January 11, 1901, providing for the investigation of the facts relating to the dissolution and reincorporation of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, its admission to do business in Texas, etc., agree to all the report of the majority, except wherein they recommend to the house the adoption of the proposed resolution.

There was absolutely no difference, Mr. President, between the majority and the minority upon the question of my exoneration. The only controversy was as to the denunciation of the men who had instigated the political assault. Upon the motion to substitute the minority for the majority report the vote stood 44 to 70. The minority report was thus rejected, and the vote came upon the adoption of the majority report. The gentlemen who voted against it were the same gentlemen, with one exception, who had already voted for the minority report. I want to read to the Senate some reasons which were given by gentlemen who supported the minority report:

We vote for the minority report of the BAILEY investigating committee for the reason that we believe that it as fully exonerates Mr. BAILEY and any State officials as does the majority report, and casts no insinuations on the motives of any citizen of Texas who may have criticised the readmission of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company into Texas to do business, and who have questioned the propriety of Mr. BAILEY'S connection therewith.

There were statements by other members of the legislature to the same effect, and so it is that when this writer says there was a serious division in the legislature of Texas over my exoneration he deliberately attempts to deceive the public.

He says:

BAILEY was elected Senator on the same day.

But he omits to say that I received 137 votes in that legislature, while only 6 were cast against me, and he omits also to say that after six years, during which this matter has been discussed until decent men have become disgusted with it, my next election to the Senate is as certain and will be as unanimous as the first.

But he says that all of this has happened because we have a political machine in Texas. He presumes upon the ignorance of the people who may read this article as to political conditions in Texas. It is the one Commonwealth of the Union in which a political machine has never yet been constructed, and in which a machine could never endure. And amongst all the men who have taken part in the politics of that great State, no one is more exempt from the charge of being a machine candidate than I was then or than I am now.

Mr. President, I never in my life organized a committee to promote my election to any office. No man ever contributed a dollar to secure either my nomination or my election. More than that, when I was a candidate for the Senate I appealed directly to the people. My demand was that in every county my candidacy and that of my opponent should be submitted to a direct vote in the primary, and that course prevailed in nearly every county. I canvassed that State for one month—as I now recall it, exactly one month—and I spent in that race for the Senate less than one month's salary.

I happen to remember it well. When I learned that my opponent had withdrawn I was at the depot in the town of Smithville, and my friends were congratulating me upon the cessation of the contest. One man said it would save me a great deal of work and a good deal of money. Another gentleman who stood by said it would save me a good deal of work, but it would not save me any money, because I was one of the kind that do not spend money in elections. After some little banter between the two, this friend asked me how much I had spent. I said that I left Washington with exactly one month's salary; and to settle their dispute I examined my book and found that I still had a $20 bill left with some change in my pocket. Less than one month's salary in a Senatorial contest during which I canvassed the State for an entire month!

Mr. President, I was five times elected to the House of Representatives; I have been once elected to the Senate; and I have spent less money in all those elections than the man who owns this magazine spent, perhaps, in a single ward when he was a candidate for mayor in the city of New York. His sworn return shows, according to the papers, that he spent over $60,000 in that contest. That is forty times as much as I ever spent in politics in all my life, and yet he talks about my machine and corrupt political methods. It is a matter of great satisfaction to me to say that there could be no surer way of inviting defeat in the State of Texas than for a man to use his money or to organize his machine.

Mr. President, if I needed any help in Texas this article would have contributed it. It so happens that every time it touches any question which relates to that State it is so obviously incorrect that even if what else it said about me had been true the people of Texas would not believe it, because, knowing that everything was false about which they possessed personal knowledge, they would naturally conclude that everything else was false.

The next specification which this magazine writer makes against me is entitled "The Indian Territory grab." Here is its first sentence:

Last April, when a huge Indian Territory coal, timber, and oil grab was on its stealthy way through the traitor Senate, under the auspices of the "merger," and under cover of fake railway-rate bill excitement, it was LA FOLLETTE, a new Senator from far-away Wisconsin, who exposed it.

Before the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin became a member of the Senate I had gone before the Committee on Indian Affairs and had urged that these mineral lands still belonging to the Indians should be reserved from sale and consecrated to the education of the children in that country. I said the same to the Senator from Wisconsin.

I do not sanction the statement that the provision which the Indian Affairs Committee brought into the Senate was a steal. I think that provision was supported by men as honest as the Senator from Wisconsin or I, but I do believe that it was an unwise disposition of those lands, and therefore I resisted it and throughout the contest over it I was cooperating with the Senator from Wisconsin. If he stopped a steal, I helped him, adn I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to rise in his place and say whether or not we cooperated in that matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I take great pleasure in saying that I conferred with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] before I offered any amendment or took part in any discussion in opposition to the sale or the disposal in any manner of the coal lands in the Indian Territory, and that I received from him valuable suggestions, advice, and cooperation in whatever I did or undertook to do with respect to those lands.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that is precisely the manly statement which I would expect from the Senator. We thoroughly agreed not only upon that, but upon other matters, to which I now desire to call the attention of the Senate.

Further on in this same paragraph this writer says:

And the amendment, which made it possible for home seekers to buy Indian lands, but impossible for corrupt corporations to grab them, was killed on a point of order.

Here, again, I was cooperating with the Senator from Wisconsin. The only difference between him and me was that he wanted those lands disposed of under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, in whose wisdom, I will say, he has more confidence than I have. I do not doubt the honesty of the Secretary of the Interior. If I had ever doubted it, he has done all that is necessary to remove that doubt. But I have always found that he was looking more after the Indians in the Indian Territory than the white population there. Perhaps that was his duty as Secretary of the Interior. But for years I have acted upon the theory that that was a white man's country, and that the law designed to preserve the Indian would tie the hands and retard the progress of the white man. That was the only difference between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself.

The difference between me and other Senators who insisted upon the point of order and opposed the amendment was, and only was, that they felt that if the restriction on alienation was continued the value of the land would greatly enhance, the benefit of which the Indian would obtain. My difference with them was simply this: That the lands would enhance in value enormously, but the Indian would not get the benefit of it, because in the meantime others would use and occupy it at a nominal rent; and believing that the Indian would not get the benefit in the end, I advocated the immediate sale of those lands, so that the present tenants in the Indian Territory might purchase it and become home owners. If any Senator or any citizen chooses to examine the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 27th and 28th of April he will find that for two hours I stood on the floor of the Senate and plead for the privilege of those tenants there to buy this land now, and I warned the Senate that if these restrictions on its alienation were continued, the land would so greatly enhance in price that when the Indians could sell it a poor man would be unable to buy it. That was the argument I made from beginning to end.

Again, Mr. President, this writer says, under the caption of "Indian Territory grab:"

On the other hand, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so full of surprises for the careful reader, reveals that BAILEY has been, in his fourteen years at Washington, one of the chief introducers of Indian Territory railway and land bills—bills granting rights of way to railways, bills renewing, extending, and broadening charters.

He then proceeds to give a list of the bills of that character which I have introduced. It would not be singular if I had introduced more bills affecting the Indian Territory than any other Senator or Member. I live within 7 miles of the border line between the Indian Territory and Texas. That Territory has no Representative or Delegate in Congress. It has no Senator in this body. If bills are introduced permitting its development, Senators and Representatives from other States must introduce them. And yet, Mr. President, I was always careful about introducing any bill relating to the Indian Territory, and the RECORD shows what this magazine conceals, that I introduced every bill it enumerates, with a single exception, by request, and they were marked "by request," thus disavowing all responsibility for it. When a citizen of my State sends me a bill and asks me to introduce it, if I have time to examine it and it commends itself to my judgment, I introduce it on my own responsibility. But if I do not have the time to examine it, or if after examining it I do not approve it, I do as every other careful Senator and Representative does—I mark it "by request."

Mr. President, the only bill in this list which I did not introduce by request was for the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad. That was a corporation organized by the most reputable business men in the town where I live, for the purpose of building a railroad from my home to the coal fields of the Indian Territory. I know every man connected with it, and I was so thoroughly and heartily in sympathy with the project that I would have been one of the incorporators except for the fact that being a member of Congress it was necessary for me to obtain the charter, and for that reason I was unwilling to have even a nominal connection with it. Can any man believe that a sound-minded Senator or Representative would refuse to introduce a bill which allowed his own people to build a railroad that would bring cheap fuel to his neighbors? Fuel is an important item in the prairie country of northern Texas, and a Representative who would not have proposed a proper bill enabling his neighbors and his constituents to lighten their fuel cost would have been recreant to their best interests and to his plain duty.

Again, this man says:

All the measures introduced by BAILEY looked well enough; no doubt many of them were harmless enough in and of themselves; no doubt many of them might have been most beneficent if properly investigated and freed of all sly looting schemes.

In this article he testifies to the integrity and efficiency of the Secretary of the Interior, and perhaps it will console him to know that every one of those bills was referred to the Interior Department before it was even reported favorably by any committee, and if they were not properly "freed from looting schemes" the fault lies with the Secretary of the Interior, to whom the writer gives a certificate of high character. The Secretary of the Interior is one of the few men whom he praises, and that moves me to suspect that the Secretary of the Interior is one of the few men who do not stand in the way of somebody's ambition.

The next charge against me is that I spent some of the present session in discussing "the fake railroad rate bill." I will not insult the intelligence of the American people by answering that grave charge. It is rather a high compliment to me that after five months of diligent quest they have found no more serious charges than these. They have raked the gutters from Houston, Tex., to New York, coming by way of Lexington, Ky., and not forgetting the horse-training stables there, and the end of it is a feeble attempt to infer some wrong.

He makes another charge. He says I was opposed to the pure-food bill, and here is the way he testifies to my constituents that I was right:

The Gorman, or the so-called "Democratic" gang reaches the same end of protecting the plutocracy by the way so long used by and for the antebellum slavocracy.

That is a mild appeal to the dead prejudices of the North; but it will affect nobody except some one who is so simple-minded as to believe what he finds in the Cosmopolitan Magazine. This writer then adds:

The Constitution must be strictly interpreted; the rights of the States must not be violated!

And he puts an exclamation mark there, as if to evidence his abhorrence of such a doctrine. Mr. President, whether it was used by what he calls the "slavocracy" or not, I cheerfully range myself upon the side of the men who believe in a strict construction of the Constitution and in a sound defense of the doctrine of States rights, and I welcome him, as I welcome every man, to make all the capital against me he can out of that circumstance.

It will surprise some people to know that this is the sum of all that was said about my public career or in reference to my political connection in an article which for five long months has been advertised as a coming sensation. He says some other things about my business and professional career to which I make no reply. He says that I practice law successfully, in that I make money. If he will ask my clients, he will also find that I have practiced law successfully in the way of protecting their interests. If that is a crime, it is time the country should know it. Mr. President, I despise those public men who think they must remain poor in order to be considered honest. I am not one of them. If my constituents want a man who is willing to go to the poorhouse in his old age in order to stay in the Senate during his middle age, they will have to find another Senator. I intend to make every dollar that I can honestly make, without neglecting or interfering with my public duty; and there is no other man in this country who would not do the same, if he has sense enough to keep a churchyard.

I have been in Congress fourteen years, and the man does not live who can put his finger upon a speech or vote that I have ever made or cast in the interest of my clients and against the interest of my constituents.

This man says himself—I dislike a little to call him as a witness, but surely he will not be deemed a witness partial in my favor—beginning the very second paragraph of his article:

Of course, in the House, in the Senate, and on the stump, BAILEY has spoken as strenuously for people and country as any other politician.

No man would be willing to say in the presence of men who know the truth that I have ever spoken one way and voted another. There is the record. It is an open book, fourteen years long, and not a single instance can be found where I have spoken and voted differently.

This man says I speak for country and people. As I vote like I speak, then I must vote for country and people. And yet though I have spoken for country and people and voted for country and people, he asks the men in whose service I work day and night to believe that I have betrayed their interests.

Mr. President, perhaps I owe the Senate and the country an apology for having dignified this screed by noticing it in the Senate. I have done it against the advice of nearly all my friends, but I have done it under a solemn sense of obligation to the public.

I want to say this: It may have been somewhat barbaric, but I believe in the old civilization, under which when a man slandered you you had a right to call him to answer for it. But I recognize that I live in another civilization, which does not permit that course. I want also to say to the country that the very fact that these attacks are permitted to pass unchallenged encourages men to make them. They misstate the record. They suppress the truth. Why? Because they feel that the men whom they attack will sit silent under their misrepresentations.

But, Mr. President, it is reassuring, even when we think of this, to remember that they constitute only a small per cent of the magazines and newspapers of the land. As in every neighborhood we find men and women who are banished for their evil habits from decent association, so in the midst of the splendid publications striving to enlighten, uplift, and glorify mankind, we must not despair when we find such as this. They can no more corrupt the mind of the American people than the degenerate amongst men and women can degrade society.

Even in my most resentful mood against papers and publications like this I have never seen the time when I would abridge the just freedom of the press. I believe that the light ought to beat fiercely on every man who occupies a high position, but in God's name let it be the white light of truth without the taint of yellow in it.

These men do harm, almost unmeasured harm; but they do it in another way, and that other way is this: They slander the upright, and therefore when reputable publications accuse the treacherous the public are incredulous about the charge. No men have ever done the rascals a greater service than those who try to make the people believe that all men are rascals. That creed can never find acceptance in this land, and the only effect of such teaching is that at last the pendulum swings back to the other extreme, and the people conclude that nobody is half as bad as they are painted.

Such publications as this ought to be scourged by decent magazine writers from the company of well-behaved men and women. They ought to be outlawed, as it were, in a literary sense, and left to suffer under the contempt, into which they unjustly sought to bring honest men.

Mr. President, there is one other matter which I wanted to call to the attention of the Senate, but I have almost overlooked it. The day after this article appeared in the magazine, to which Mr. HEARST'S name is not attached, there appeared an editorial in the Evening Journal, to which Mr. HEARST'S name is attached. It is a double column of mendacity and malice, and yet the only direct averment against my public service is that I have voted to give away the public lands to corporations; and he says that in the face of the RECORD, which shows that I never voted to give an acre of public land to any corporation in my life.

This article is not altogether political; it is a little commercial. Listen to this: And remembering that Mr. HEARST owns the magazine, for whose bonds he stands a guarantor to the extent of $500,000, we can easily understand what interest he has in its financial prosperity. So he tells his readers through his paper:

We believe that a majority of our leading citizens will read Mr. Phillips's entire article for their own information, and we urge them to purchase the July Cosmopolitan and do so.

There is some thrift mixed with a little politics. HEARST'S magazine prints a slander against a man, and then HEARST'S newspaper advises those who read it to buy the magazine; and this editorial not only appeared in his New York publication, but it appeared in his Chicago one as well.

Mr. President, it is a great temptation for me to say what I think about these people, but that would offend the dignity and propriety of the Senate, and I forbear. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must inform the occupants of the galleries that applause is not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I rise to make a privileged statement in regard to the conference upon the agricultural appropriation bill and the differences between the House and the Senate referred to the other day here. We had agreed in conference upon all the items except the one in regard to meat inspection and one minor one, which we doubtless could have agreed upon, but the House conferees——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont will suspend until the Senate is in order. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. HALE. This is a very important statement that the Senator from Vermont is making, and every Senator ought to hear it.

Mr. PROCTOR. The conferees on the part of the House positively refused to consider any proposition of compromise upon this point of the meat inspection. The Senate conferees submitted a proposition for a compromise. The provision of the House, which appropriates $3,000,000 for the cost of inspection, is as follows:

That there is permanently appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, for the expenses of the inspection of cattle, sheep, swine, and goats and the meat and meat food products thereof which enter into interstate or foreign commerce and for all expenses necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act relating to meat inspection, including rent and the employment of labor in Washington and elsewhere, for each year. And the Secretary of Agriculture shall, in his annual estimates made to Congress, submit a statement in detail, showing the number of persons employed in such inspections and the salary or per diem paid to each, together with the contingent expenses of such inspectors and where they have been and are employed.

The conferees on the part of the Senate proposed as a compromise that there be added to the above the following:

The entire cost of inspection shall be paid from this appropriation, but to reimburse the Treasury for the expense incurred for the inspection of meat food products subsequent to the inspection of the live animal and the carcass, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon the return to the Secretary of Agriculture of the number of animals inspected and examined under the provisions of this act, collect and deposit in the Treasury a fee of 5 cents each for every head of cattle inspected and examined, and 3 cents for each head of sheep, swine, and goats so inspected and examined, and he shall publish the necessary rules and regulations for carrying out this provision.

This the House conferees positively refused to consider, or any other proposition, insisting that we accept absolutely the provision that they submitted.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. HALE. Can the Senator tell the Senate from any estimate he has made what portion of the $3,000,000 appropriated by the Government would be reimbursed or returned to the Treasury from the source that he has indicated?

Mr. PROCTOR. One-half, perhaps a little more, would be reimbursed and paid into the Treasury.

I might say, further—I think it is justifiable under the circumstances to say—that they not only positively refused to join in any report—for we had agreed upon everything substantially except this item—so far as we had agreed and assent to another conference, but they took a position that involves the failure of the bill unless we yielded everything they asked.

Mr. HALE. Is it not then the practical result that if the House conferees maintain their ground and refuse further conference and refuse all propositions all legislation is arrested on the subject?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is, Mr. President. It seems so to me. There can be no doubt of it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. NELSON. What result, if any, did the conference reach as to the date on the label—as to the labeling?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The date on the cans.

Mr. PROCTOR. We did not reach that point. The other came up first. We reached it only so far as this, that they insisted upon the whole. We did not discuss that. There was no chance for a compromise upon that. It must be with the date or without it, but their insistence was upon the entire measure as they proposed it.

Mr. NELSON. They would not yield on any point?

Mr. HALE. For the present, then, there is nothing further that the Senator or his fellow-conferees representing the Senate can do but to await action on being called together again by the House conferees. Has the Senator any programme other than that?

Mr. PROCTOR. None whatever, Mr. President. I see nothing whatever that the conferees on the part of the Senate can do. There was a positive refusal to join in any report, although everything had been agreed to substantially except this one item.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I think the Senate is indebted to the Senator from Vermont for stating just what the situation is upon this most important matter, and my impression is that for the present we will do well to leave it there. Overnight or in the morning something may come from the House conferees to open the question. I should like myself to have the opportunity given. Without any hasty action here which would perhaps tend to further inflame the condition, I should prefer to have the matter stand just as it is overnight, and in the morning we will see whether anything further can be done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I want to ask the Senator from Maine, who is, as he frequently says of other Senators, an old legislator, and has had very much to do with appropriations, whether, in his experience, there have been many cases similar to this, where the conferees of one body refused to have a bill reported to the Houses showing the points upon which an agreement had been reached?

Mr. HALE. In my official life here in the Senate I have known but one case. I recall a case which I think may have been similar to this. It was a long controversy upon the naval appropriation bill. I think perhaps other old Senators who were here at the time will remember it. In that case my recollection is that the House conferees declined a further conference and declined to submit any further report.

The processes provided by the rule are agreement, disagreement, or insistence, or, finally, adherence. The rule provides that either House, when it is determined upon a certain course on an amendment or a statute, can close the matter up, so far as any further steps are taken, by voting to adhere. That is a notice to the other House that the House voting to adhere will have no further conference and nothing else except what it desires.

One reason why I suggested that no hasty action be taken now is that when this goes back, not as a conference report, but as a statement to the House, I should hope that the reasonable men in that body—and there are plenty of them—will not proceed to the extremity of voting to adhere, and that out of reflection, as in a thousand cases that occur in all our lives, will come a feeling that upon this important matter no pride of opinion and no pride in the body shall prevent some salutary legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish to make an inquiry before the Senator from Vermont yields the floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question, merely whether the Senate is to understand the Senator from Vermont as reporting that the House conferees would rather see the entire bill defeated than to yield upon any point or modify any point of the bill. That, it strikes me, is an exceedingly important statement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to know if I correctly understood the Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is for the Senator to answer, but it seems to me that the language used by the conferees on either side ought not to be bruited about in either the House or the Senate if they do not agree.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The statement was made, and I think it is important to know whether that is the attitude. We want to know what the situation is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PROCTOR. Allow me to reply to the Senator from Illinois. I made the statement that their position involved the failure of the bill, as will be seen by the RECORD. I stand by that statement. Whether it is proper or not, it is true.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, Mr. President, I think it only fair to the House members of the conference committee that the Senator should state the explicit and forceful language he used on that proposition. This is a matter as to which I think the Senate ought not to condemn the House conferees for language they have used without an opportunity of their being heard to show whether there was any provocation for language of that kind.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I can say——

Mr. NELSON. I think the Senate ought to know.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to reply to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]. I can say, for once, that the conduct of the Senate conferees was entirely amiable. We said nothing to bring out such an earnest statement from the House conferees.

Mr. HALE. You were modest.

Mr. PROCTOR. We are always so.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. PROCTOR. Wait a moment. We simply asked if we could make a report of conditions—what was agreed to and what would be disagreed to. The House conferees positively declined to assent to that. Everything we said was in the direction of trying to come to an amicable agreement.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. HOPKINS. The reason I made my suggestion along the line I did was that, if we are to get a bill, there must be an agreement between the conferees of the Senate and of the House, and if the language of the conferees of the House is given in the Senate and they are denounced, it seems to me that that sort of thing is not something that will placate them and make them the more readily agree. We know, Mr. President, that they are reasonable men, the same as are the conferees on the part of the Senate, and that they have no opportunity of being heard upon this floor. I think the discussion should be limited to the attitude of the Senate conferees, without any reflection on the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have not intended, Mr. President, to reflect upon the House conferees. I have merely stated what they said. Now I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I did not hear the first statement made by the Senator from Vermont as to what is the condition.

Mr. PROCTOR. That the House conferees refused to join in any report unless we agreed absolutely to their propositions.

Mr. WARREN. In regard to what?

Mr. PROCTOR. In regard to the meat-inspection amendment principally, although there was one other matter in dispute.

Mr. WARREN. Then, as I understand, the conferees have agreed upon all matters but those?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a word, I will say that I think the advice of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is good, as it always is, and I am generally willing to follow his advice. In this meat-inspection matter we have a condition which is, I believe, unprecedented in legislation. I recall nothing that has happened since I have been a member of this body, and I do not recall ever having heard or read of any, where a proposition involving millions and millions of dollars, at the last moment, without consideration by any committee or the Senate, was submitted and attached as an amendment to an appropriation bill without a word of debate. Such action creates a condition that naturally would cause a wide difference between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The Senate did not carefully consider the matter, but desiring to correct one evil in a hurry and without much thought, it agreed to the amendment on this floor in a matter of four or five minutes; while, on the other hand, the Agricultural Appropriation Committee of the other House, consisting of some seventeen or nineteen men, practical farmers and practical business men, entered into hearings and the taking of testimony on the subject. They had the matter under earnest and attentive consideration for weeks, and after the hearings, the taking of evidence, and full discussion the committee brought in a substitute amendment, as it had a right to do, and the House agreed to the same. It seems to me, under these circumstances, we can afford to be very patient, and I do not know but we can afford to be rather more than patient with those who are evidently trying to do their duty, and who have at least behind them the proof of their earnestness and attention in their long and laborious work in connection with this subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to ask a question, Mr. President, to see whether I apprehend the situation correctly. The conferees having been unable to agree on a certain proposition in the agricultural appropriation bill, I understand the Senate conferees proposed to report a disagreement?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. And that was absolutely refused. So they are unable to report a partial agreement, a complete disagreement, or a complete agreement, and they are not allowed to go to their respective Houses for instructions. That is the point. It is not a conflict between the Senate and the House. It is because the House conferees will not permit the Senate and the House to pass on what is still in dispute.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I want, as a Senator here, to protest against the discussion by a member of this body of what occurs in a conference committee. A Member of the other House can not speak for himself here; he can not stand up and say that this did not occur or that something else equally as bad did occur upon the part of the Senate conferees.

I served on many conference committees while I had the honor of being a Member of the House of Representatives; and while I have no desire to criticise, I have never yet stood up in that body and said the conferees on the part of the Senate said so and so, because the conferees on the part of the Senate had no power or right on the floor of the House to answer my charge. So the conferees on the part of the House have no right here to reply to statements made by Senators as to what occurred in conference.

I desire to put this question to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who has had long experience on conference committees: Is it not the rule of conferences that where legislation is placed upon an appropriation bill the body seeking to legislate must recede if the other body dissent? There is no place upon an appropriation bill, as a rule, for legislation. We talk about things getting through the Congress of the United States without notice. They get through sometimes by putting them into a bill of perhaps 300-odd pages, and driving them through. I am not in sympathy with the idea that legislation can be placed upon an appropriation bill as this legislation was, whether it be good or bad, without discussion.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I want to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], who has served on a great many conference committees, a question in relation to this matter. This is the case of a bill coming here originally from the House and the Senate adding on a new appropriation, both enlarging the agricultural appropriation bill as to expenditures and enacting new legislation. If, under such circumstances, the other House resist, is it not the rule that the Senate should recede? If, in other words, legislation is put on in either House and submitted to the other, and the House to which it is submitted insists upon disagreeing to it, is not the House placing it there in duty bound to recede?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In my judgment—and I believe the Senator from Maine will agree with me—either body which places legislation upon an appropriation bill must recede if the other House insists that it shall.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I submit that that is not this case. Where we put legislation upon an appropriation bill, if the other House oppose that, it might be our duty to recede, but they do not oppose that. They propose a substitute, to themselves legislate. I insist that it is an entirely different case.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then there is a disagreement.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is a disagreement, and that is all.

Mr. WARREN. And it is incumbent upon them either to agree or to disagree.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I understand from the statement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] that he is not asking anything at this time. He simply comes here and states what the condition is. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], very properly, I think, advised him to let the thing go over until to-morrow morning, and in the meantime one side or the other may think of something that will bring them together again. That is all there is in this case.

Mr. PROCTOR. That is what I propose to do, Mr. President. I did not think of asking for any action on the part of the Senate at this time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as I have been appealed to by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] to state what is my experience, I will state that when either House puts in an appropriation bill legislation it can not force the other House to agree, but it must in the end recede if the proposition is one that the other House will not at all agree to. In this case it seems to me, from the very clear and guarded statement of the Senator from Vermont, that it is not a question of the House resisting absolutely and declaring that nothing shall go on the bill, but it is a question of agreeing between the two bodies as to what legislation shall be adopted different from what the Senate has put on. I do not think we take any profit by further inflaming the situation. To test the sense of the Senate that for the present this matter shall stand, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Maine will not make that motion, but will let us have an executive session.

Mr. HALE. If it is desirable to have an executive session, I will not insist upon the motion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have a conference report which I desire to make.

Mr. HALE. Then I withhold the motion for the present.

PROTECTION OF WILD BIRDS AND ANIMALS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13193) to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

UNLADING OF BONDED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey, Mr. BONYNGE, and Mr. BURNETT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17345) creating a United States district court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. DENBY, and Mr. HOWARD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 88) entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture, sell, or offer for sale within any Territory or the District of Columbia, or deliver for shipment or to cause to be delivered, shipped, or transported from within any State, Territory, or District of Columbia to any State, Territory, or District of Columbia or foreign country any article of food, drugs, medicines, or liquors which is adulterated or misbranded, or which contains any poisonous or deleterious substance within the meaning of this act; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed five hundred dollars or shall be sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and for each subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars or sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 2. That no dealer shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer, or other party residing in the United States, from whom he purchases such articles, to the effect that the same is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, designating it. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such articles to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach, in due course, to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, or of a poisonous or deleterious character, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of by destruction or sale, as the said court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, but such goods shall not be sold in any jurisdiction contrary to the provisions of this act or the laws of that jurisdiction: Provided, however, That upon the payment of the costs of such libel proceedings and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond to the effect that such articles shall not be sold or otherwise disposed of contrary to the provisions of this act, or the laws of any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, the court may by order direct that such articles be delivered to the owner thereof. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

"SEC. 11. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request from time to time, samples of foods and drugs which are being imported into the United States or offered for import, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture, and have the right to introduce testimony, and if it appear from the examination of such samples that any article of food or drug offered to be imported into the United States is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or is otherwise dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or is of a kind forbidden entry into, or forbidden to be sold or restricted in sale in the country in which it is made or from which it is exported, or is otherwise falsely labeled in any respect, the said article shall be refused admission, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any goods refused delivery which shall not be exported by the consignee within three months from the date of notice of such refusal under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee such goods pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a penal bond for the amount of the full invoice value of such goods, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such goods for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, when demanded, for the purpose of excluding them from the country, or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond: And provided further, That all charges for storage, cartage, and labor on goods which are refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee, and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importation made by such owner or consignee.

"SEC. 12. That the term 'territory' as used in this act shall include the insular possessions of the United States. The word 'person' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, societies, and associations. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House take a recess this evening not later than 6 o'clock, until 8 o'clock, to consider the bill H. R. 19750, under an order exactly in terms with the order for last night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess at 6 o'clock——

Mr. BARTLETT. Not later than 6 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Not later than 6 o'clock, until 8 o'clock, and that the evening session be held from 8 until not later than 11.

Mr. PAYNE. Under the same terms as the order for last night.

The SPEAKER. Under the same terms as the order of yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that there was some little dispute last night as to what the terms of the agreement were. The usual course in matters of this kind has been to put the time under the control of the chairman of the committee having the bill under its charge and the senior member of the other party on the committee, and let them divide the time, the time to be equally divided between the two parties. Now, last night again there was some little friction, which was totally unnecessary, because it was not, or seemed not to be, clearly understood that the time was to be equally divided between the two parties; and I would suggest to the gentleman, as an addendum to his request, this: That the time be equally divided between the two parties, the time upon that side of the Chamber to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], as chairman of the committee, and the time on this side to be under my control, as senior Democratic member on the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I feel unwilling to consent to that. I do not like the idea at all of the chairman of the committee and a member of the minority controlling the time on one side of the House or the other. It leads to long yielding out of time, and adds to the debate. The friction last night arose out of the fact that the gentleman's side had thirty-five minutes more of general debate in the afternoon than this side of this House, and from no other cause. The gentleman ought to be satisfied, as long as his side has half of the time, while we have 100 more Members on our side than he has on his, and I would not like to make any agreement to that effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have never heard yet that the fact that one side had 100 more Members than another had ever been thought of as a reason why debate should be unequally divided. The gentleman is correct in this, that we had yesterday during the daytime from twenty-five to thirty minutes' advantage in the time of debate.

Mr. BURLESON. They had their time, if they had wanted to occupy it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. True, because the order of the House was that this side should have an hour and that side have an hour; and that side did not use its hour. That was not our fault. But notwithstanding that, I am perfectly willing, to-day, during the day, that that side shall have its twenty-five or thirty minutes additional to make up, because I want to do the square thing.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman knows that is impracticable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know no such thing. I know the contrary. But I do want it understood that at the night session the time is to be equally divided between the two parties, so that when we object to a Republican taking up more than half of the entire time of the night, the right to object shall not again be questioned, nor our motive questioned.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York restate his proposition?

Mr. PAYNE. My proposition is that to-night, not later than 6 o'clock, the House take a recess until 8 o'clock for general debate only, the session to hold not later than 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is their objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to amend the request for unanimous consent by asking that in addition to that this be submitted to the House: "The time to be equally divided between the two parties."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York modify his request?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not see how I can help objecting unless it is agreed that the time shall be equally divided.

GRAND CANYON FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2732) for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to designate such areas in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve as should, in his opinion, be set aside for the protection of game animals and be recognized as a breeding place therefor.

SEC. 2. That when such areas have been designated as provided in section 1 of this act, hunting, trapping, killing, or capturing of game animals upon the lands of the United States within the limits of said areas shall be unlawful, except under such regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture; and any person violating such regulations or the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction in any United States court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. That it is the purpose of this act to protect from trespass the public lands of the United States and the game animals which may be thereon, and not to interfere with the operation of the local game laws as affecting private, State, or Territorial lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, there is a portion of the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, north of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, that is ideally adapted as a game preserve, and is already well stocked with deer, mountain sheep, pine chickens, as well as wolves, coyotes, and mountain lions. On what is locally known as the "Buckskin Mountains," but which is designated on the map as the Karhab Plateau, there is an area of about 2,000 square miles that can be at comparatively trivial cost converted into an inclosed game preserve. This tract is effectually fenced by that eighth great wonder of the world, the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, on the south and southeast, and on the west by the impassable gulf of the Kanab wash. By connecting these natural barriers by a fence a distance of some 16 miles the entire tract would be securely inclosed, and migration of game absolutely precluded. This region is a part of what is known as the "Arizona Strip"—that part of the Territory of Arizona completely isolated and cut off from the balance of the Territory by the impassable barrier of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. This part of Arizona should be annexed to Utah. There is but one small community located near the Utah line on the entire strip. A citizen of this strip is required to travel 300 miles by team to visit his county seat. The people residing on the strip would hail such a change with joy. A large part of this strip has been included in a forest reserve. There is no running water worthy of mention within the entire reserve, and there is enough timber going to waste annually to supply all the wants of the people in that section of Utah and Arizona. There is no water to conserve, and isolation is sufficient to protect the timber against everything but forest fires, but it is nevertheless a forest reserve, and I hope it will now become a game preserve, for which it is eminently adapted.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION, UTAH.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6395) for the exchange of certain lands situated in the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, and other considerations, for lands adjacent thereto, between Le Grand Young and the Government of the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, for and on behalf of the United States, is hereby authorized to grant and convey by deed to Le Grand Young, his heirs and assigns forever, that portion of the lands comprised within the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, adjoining Salt Lake City, Utah, described as follows, to wit: Commencing at the west boundary line of the Fort Douglas Military Reservation at a point where it is intersected by the south line of First South street, in Salt Lake City, Salt Lake County, State of Utah, and running thence north on said west boundary line of said military reservation a distance of 1,590 feet, more or less, to the southwest corner of what is known as "Popperton place," in Salt Lake City; thence east on a line between the said military reservation and the said Popperton place, a distance of 1,159 feet; thence south on a line running parallel to the said west boundary line of the military reservation a distance of 1,590 feet, more or less, to the northeast corner of the land granted to the University of Utah by act of Congress approved July 23, 1894; thence west along the north line of said university lands a distance of 1,159 feet to the place of beginning, containing 42.3 acres of land, reserving, however, for the use of the military and the public a right of way in and over the present macadamized road leading from the post of Fort Douglas through said premises to Salt Lake City: Provided, That there is hereby granted and reserved to the University of Utah a perpetual easement for the construction, maintenance, and repair of a pipe line over the following-described portion of said lands: Beginning at the intersection of the north line of First South street with the west line of the said military reservation, and running thence north along the west line of the said reservation 50 feet; thence east 1,159 feet; thence south 50 feet; thence west 1,159 feet to the place of beginning: And provided further, That there is hereby granted and reserved to Salt Lake City, a municipality organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah, in the State of Utah, a perpetual easement for the construction, maintenance, and repair of a pipe line over the following-described portion of said lands: Commencing at the northwest corner of the University of Utah campus, running thence north along the west boundary of the Fort Douglas United States Military Reservation 200 feet; thence east 1,164.83 feet; thence south 200 feet; thence west 1,164.83 feet to the place of beginning. The Secretary of War is further authorized to convey to the said Le Grand Young, his heirs and assigns, a right of way 100 feet wide, for a railroad and wagon road, along the south side of the said military reservation, within metes and bounds as follows: Commencing at the southeast corner of the said military reservation and running thence west 600 rods to the southwest corner; thence north 100 feet; thence east 600 rods; thence south 100 feet to the place of beginning: Provided, That said roadway shall be subject to use by the public for highway purposes.

SEC. 2. That the deed provided for in section 1 of this act shall not be delivered to the said Le Grand Young until said Le Grand Young shall have first conveyed to the United States a title in fee simple, free and clear of all incumbrances, subject to the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States, to all of the following-described lands, easements, and ways, to wit: All of lots 4, 5, and 6, of section 2, township 1 south, range 1 east, and all of section 36, township 1 north, range 1 east, Salt Lake meridian; also, a release of all rights reserved by deed from Le Grand Young, trustee, dated April 23, 1888, under act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, entitled "An act granting a right of way through certain public lands of the United States in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes;" and of all rights granted by said act to the Salt Lake Rock Company, its successors or assigns, in and over the following-described land, to wit: Sections 24, 25, and 35, and the east half of section 26, township 1 north, range 1 east; section 19, the south half of section 18, the west half of section 20, and the north half of section 30, township 1 north, range 2 east; including all rights of way on said lands, and also all rights of way on the Fort Douglas Military Reservation appurtenant to said lands, or used in connection therewith.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon the approval of the conveyances provided for in section 2 of this act, to pay to the said Le Grand Young, his heirs or assigns, in further consideration therefor, the sum of $5,000; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to make said payment and cover the expenses of the execution of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I understand this matter is placed in the hands of the Secretary of War, and that he recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, this bill merely carries into effect an agreement for the transfer of certain lands between the Secretary of War and Mr. Le Grande Young, of Salt Lake City. By the provisions of the bill the Secretary of War is authorized to convey to Mr. Young about 42 acres in the northwest corner of the reservation, adjoining the City of Salt Lake, valuable for residences and other purposes, in exchange for a tract comprising nearly 1,000 acres adjoining the reservation on the east. By the acquisition of this extensive tract from Mr. Young the Government secures exclusive and absolute control of the watershed and water supply for Fort Douglas. It will afford ample opportunity for field and target practice and furnish adequate ground for all military purposes. It will greatly enlarge the advantages of Fort Douglas as a rendezvous for a larger garrison than has been heretofore quartered there.

This addition to the reservation meets my full and hearty approval, but I think the purchase of it should have been made outright, thus leaving the 42 acres for future disposition for the public interests. While I am not fully in accord with the methods by which this land is acquired, the general result is so desirable that I have yielded to the desire of the Department, and consent to the passage of the bill.

Fort Douglas is picturesquely situated on an eminence overlooking the beautiful city of Salt Lake City from the east. I hope now that its boundaries have been enlarged and its military advantages increased, that the War Department will be induced to give greater consideration to maintaining a full complement of troops there, and also give proper attention to the improvement and beautifying of its grounds, until it shall be what its picturesque location ought to demand—an attractive and delightful suburb of the beautiful City of Salt Lake.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid laid on the table.

CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATE OF OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3200) providing when patents shall issue to the purchasers of certain lands in the State of Oregon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who have heretofore purchased any of the lands of the Umatilla Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, and have made or shall make full and final payment therefor in conformity with the acts of Congress of March 3, 1885, and of July 1, 1902, respecting the sale of such lands, shall be entitled to receive patent therefor upon submitting satisfactory proof to the Secretary of the Interior that the untimbered lands so purchased are not susceptible of cultivation or residence, and are exclusively grazing lands, incapable of any profitable use other than for grazing purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

UINTAH RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6375) granting lands in the former Uintah Indian Reservation to the corporation of the Episcopal Church in Utah.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the corporation of the Episcopal Church in Utah the following-described land lying within the former Uintah Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, and now occupied by the said church for missionary purposes: Beginning at the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of section 7, township 3 south, range 2 east, United States meridian; running thence north, 60° 33′ west, 233.4 feet to a stake; thence south, 16° 30′ west, 1,324.2 feet to the left bank of the Uintah River; thence along the left bank of the said river in an easterly direction to the section line between sections 7 and 8 of said township and range; thence north, no degrees 15′ east, 1,353 feet to the place of beginning, containing 12.70 acres, more or less: Provided, That said property shall be held and used for missionary, school, and religious purposes, and in case said land shall be abandoned for said purposes the said land and all improvements thereon shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPECIFICATIONS FOR GRADING LUMBER.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 67, to protect the copyrighted matter appearing in the "Rules and Specifications for Grading Lumber Adopted by the Various Lumber Manufacturing Associations of the United States." I ask that the Committee on Patents be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, a similar resolution having been reported unanimously by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Patents be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 67, a similar House bill being upon the Calendar, and that the Senate joint resolution be considered at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the proprietors of certain copyrighted grading specifications and other copyrighted matter have consented to the use of such copyrighted matter in the "Rules and Specifications for Grading Lumber Adopted by the Various Lumber Manufacturing Associations of the United States," a publication prepared in the Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture; and

Whereas sufficient authority to publish and pay for the printing of said "Rules and Specifications for Grading Lumber Adopted by the Various Lumber Manufacturing Associations of the United States" is given in the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture: Therefore Resolved, etc., That said copyrighted matter, wherever it appears in said "Rules and Specifications for Grading Lumber Adopted by the Various Lumber Manufacturing Associations of the United States," shall be plainly marked as copyrighted matter, and shall be as fully protected under the copyright laws as though published by the proprietors themselves; and the permission for the use of such matter shall be deemed to be limited to the purposes of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear some explanation of this. As I understand it, it is to protect the copyright upon some book gotten out by the Lumbermen's Association.

Mr. HINSHAW. The various lumbering manufacturing associations of the United States have some rules and specifications for grading lumber. Now, the Agricultural Department is getting up a bulletin, in which will be embraced certain features of these rules and specifications, for distribution through the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CURRIER. The various specifications being copyrighted.

Mr. HINSHAW. The rules and specifications are copyrighted, and this is simply to protect the copyright in the matter published by the Government, which is furnished to the Government by the Lumber Manufacturing Association. A similar thing was done in regard to the Woodman's Handbook, which was published heretofore. Congress protected the copyright in that work also.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon what ground, then, do you wish to confine it to the disposition of these people?

Mr. CURRIER. I think the gentleman does not understand. These people give the Government the right to use this copyrighted matter for free distribution in this publication. They do not wish by that act to lose control of the copyright in their own publication. This bill simply seeks to protect the copyright.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How will this cut off? How could these people be hurt if this were not passed?

Mr. CURRIER. I do not think they could be hurt at all, but the law officer for the Agricultural Department thinks they might be, and for that reason the proprietor of the copyright declines to allow the Government to use this matter unless this resolution be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar House joint resolution (No. 174) on the House Calendar will lie on the table.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20173) to authorize Henry T. Henderson and his associates to divert the waters of Little River from the lands of the United States for use of electric light and power plant, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Henry T. Henderson and associates purpose to erect a dam across Little River, in the State of Alabama, and at a point on said Little River in or near the southeast quarter of section 30, township 7 south, range 10 east, for the purpose of storing the waters of said river and utilizing the same in the operation of a water-power plant to be erected at or near Blanche station, on Chattanooga Southern Railroad, in Cherokee County, Ala., for the manufacture or generation of electric energy and the manufacture and sale of electric light and power; and

Whereas in the storing and utilizing of said waters the same will be diverted from the original channel of said Little River; and

Whereas below said proposed dam site said Little River passes through what is known as "Mays Gulf," in township 8 south, range 9 east, in the State of Alabama; and

Whereas the lands situated within the said Mays Gulf have never been surveyed and is the property of the United States Government; and

Whereas under the laws of the said State of Alabama the owners of land along nonnavigable streams in said State have the sole right to the use of the waters of such streams and are authorized and empowered to contract with reference thereto, and inasmuch as the United States Government, as the owner of the lands in said Mays Gulf, alone has the right as the riparian owner of the lands along said Little River, in said Mays Gulf, to grant the right to divert the waters of said stream from the channel where it passes through said lands: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, granted unto Henry T. Henderson and associates the right or authority to perpetually divert the waters of Little River from the said lands so owned by the United States of America, and situated in Mays Gulf, in township 8 south, range 9 east, in the State of Alabama, for the purpose of storing and utilizing said waters in the operation of a water-power plant to be erected at or near Blanche, in Cherokee County, in the State of Alabama, for the generation of electric energy or power, and the sale of electric light and electric power.

With the following amendments:

On page 2, line 12, after the word "power," insert: "Provided, That the said Henry T. Henderson and associates shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior the reasonable value thereof within six months after the passage of this bill, the value to be fixed by the register and receiver of the land office in the district where said water is located, and on failure to pay for the same the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, declare forfeited the right to divert said water."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama from what committee this bill comes?

Mr. BURNETT. The Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DALZELL. Would not the object be accomplished by striking out all these "whereases?" That is a very bad feature.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection whatever to that. It is more a matter of explanation than anything else.

Mr. DALZELL. It is a bad thing to put on the statute books.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no objection whatever.

Mr. DALZELL. I would suggest that the gentleman strike that out.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to strike out the preamble. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill as amended?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I would like to be yielded to for a minute or two.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the passage of this bill, but I want to call the attention of the House to the character of the legislation. This bill purports to grant the right to divert the waters of a certain creek in the State of Alabama. I think it is questionable whether Congress has any authority to grant to these parties or to anybody else the right to divert the waters of the State of Alabama. What is sought to be accomplished by this bill is a waiver of the rights of the United States as a riparian owner to certain lands along the stream below the point of diversion, and my opinion is that if it is wise to legislate along these lines the bill ought to have clearly stated its purpose. We can not grant to these people the right to divert the water of that stream. It may be held, and probably will be held, that this legislation which assumes to grant certain parties the right to divert the waters of a nonnavigable stream is in the nature of a waiver of the rights of the United States as a riparian owner along the stream. My principal objection to the legislation is that it is not in a form to indicate its real purpose, and I do hope it will not be considered a precedent for future legislation. I am of the opinion if the House fully understood the measure it would insist on putting it in a form to clearly indicate its evident purpose to secure a waiver of the rights of the Government as a riparian owner.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

LOAN OF UNITED STATES VESSEL TO PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 19755) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to loan temporarily to the Philippine government a vessel of the United States Navy for use in connection with nautical schools of the Philippine Islands, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to loan temporarily to the government of the Philippine Islands, upon the written application of the Secretary of War, a vessel of the United States Navy, to be selected from such vessels as are not suitable or required for general service, together with such of her apparel, charts, books, and instruments of navigation as he may deem proper, said vessel to be used only by such nautical schools as are or may hereafter be maintained by said government of the Philippine Islands: Provided, That when such schools shall be abandoned, or when the interests of the naval service shall so require, such vessel, together with her apparel, charts, books, and instruments of navigation, shall be immediately restored to the custody of the Secretary of the Navy: And provided further, That when such loan is made to the government of the Philippine Islands, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to detail from the enlisted force of the Navy a sufficient number of men, not exceeding six for any vessel, as ship keepers, the men so detailed to be additional to the number of enlisted men allowed by law for the naval establishment, and in making details for this service preference shall be given to those men who have served twenty years or more in the Navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS TO LIBRARY AT MANILA.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 19754) to provide for the distribution of public documents to the library of the Philippine government at Manila, P. I., which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the superintendent of documents is hereby authorized and directed to supply one copy of each document delivered to him for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and designated depositories to the library of the Philippine government, in the city of Manila, P. I.; and the Public Printer is hereby directed to print, bind, and deliver to the superintendent of documents the extra number of documents required to comply with this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ALASKA SHORT LINE RAILWAY AND NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4256) for the relief of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company's railroad, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time of the Alaska Short Line Railway and Navigation Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska is hereby extended as follows:

First. The time to file the map and profile of definite location of its second section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907.

Second. The time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 20th day of March, 1907, and such railroad and navigation company shall be entitled to all the benefits conferred upon it by the provisions of such act upon its due compliance with all the provisions thereof, excepting only the provisions thereof relating to the filing of the map and profile of definite location of its second section of not less than 20 miles of its road: Provided, That it shall have successively one year each after said 20th day of March, 1907, in which to file the map and profile of its definite location of the succeeding sections of not less than 20 miles each: And provided further, That it shall have five years in which to complete its entire line from Iliamna Bay to the Yukon River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the bill is.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it provides for the extension of a year's time for this railway to complete its surveys for the second section. It has completed the first section, and then also provides for a year's extension right through for each section—that is, it is a year's extension for the entire railroad. The statute gives four years in which to complete it, and they ask five years in which to complete it. The statute gives one year on each 20 miles, and this asks an extension of time—that is, it gives one year more time all the way through.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under the present law they allowed four year in which to complete the road?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; and they want five years. They want an extension of time on all after the first 20-mile section.

Mr. JOHNSON. How long has the road been under construction?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They commenced about a year ago, and they have got the surveys and definite locations on the first 20 miles. They do not ask an extension on that, but do on the rest. I will say, for the information of the gentleman, this road is 250 miles north of any other road and does not conflict with anybody else, no other company making any claim, and it is the unanimous report, both of the Senate and House committee.

Mr. OLMSTED. Where is this road?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It runs from Iliamna Bay to Anvic, on the Yukon. It is way up in the northern or western portion of the peninsula.

Mr. OLMSTED. Is this the company that is selling bonds on the strength of the statement this road is already in operation?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No, sir.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have no objection to the road, but I object to selling bonds on a road that is not built.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think that those connected with this road are doing anything of that kind.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that a new road?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is a comparatively new road.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does it parallel another road there?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it is way beyond those two.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is this the one Shafroth is against?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I think not, because there are Colorado people interested in it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time; was read the third time and passed.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 17112, Calendar, No. 163 is on the House Calendar. The subject-matter of that bill has been incorporated in the Indian Appropriation bill. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that that bill and also House joint resolution 133 (Private Calendar No. 2495) do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the House bill and joint resolution named will lie upon the table. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

DANIEL D. HEIDT.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 595).

Lester, late a Representative from the State of Georgia, from June 1, 1906, to June 17, 1906, the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

The question was taken; and the report was agreed to.

R. E. TOMPKINS.

Mr. CASSEL. Also the following privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

Pinckney, from April 1 to the date of said Pinckney's death, April 24, 1906, both dates inclusive.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

In line 3, after the word "House," insert the words "miscellaneous items, 1905."

In line 7 strike out "six" and insert "five."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

E. D. BELL.

Mr. CASSEL. I also offer the following.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 592).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to E. D. Bell the sum of $33.33, being amount of clerk-hire allowance due for services rendered Representive-elect JOHN M. MOORE from June 6 to June 15, 1905.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In line 3, after the word "House," insert the following: "Miscellaneous items, 1905."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSENGER, HOUSE POST-OFFICE.

Mr. CASSEL. Also the following, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 574).

Resolved, That the Postmaster of the House is hereby authorized and directed to employ a messenger for duty on the heavy mail wagon from the end of the present session to December 3, 1906, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate of compensation now paid for such service.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORTING COMMITTEE HEARINGS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also offer House resolution No. 585, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, for reporting committee hearings, such accounts as may be certified to be correct, upon vouchers approved by the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

D. P. THOMAS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also offer House resolution No. 433, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to D. P. Thomas, messenger to the Chief Clerk, the sum of $300, for extra services rendered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation of this.

Mr. CASSEL. I would say this employee is engaged during the summer at unusual work, and this resolution has been passed by former Congresses, because this man is employed during vacation. He remains here constantly, and is paid only for the services which he renders.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this additional compensation?

Mr. CASSEL. He receives no compensation during this time except the pay he receives by this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to offer House resolution No. 425, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization is hereby authorized to appoint a clerk to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $2,000 per annum from and after July 1, 1906, unless otherwise provided for by law; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the salary of said clerk in one of the general appropriation bills: Provided, That the same shall be in lieu of the session clerk assigned to said committee.

The amendment of the committee, in the nature of a substitute, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present Congress, or until otherwise provided for by law, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of a clerk to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a sum equal to the rate of $2,000 per annum, payable monthly: Provided, That so much of the resolution adopted December 19, 1905, as assigned a session clerk to said committee is hereby vacated.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a point of order against that resolution. It is plainly a change of law, and seems to me not of a privileged character.

Mr. CASSEL. In what way does it change the law, may I inquire?

Mr. PAYNE. The law provides no annual clerk for this committee with a salary of $2,000. I do not think the rule should be construed to allow the Committee on Accounts to bring in a resolution here changing existing law as to the pay of an officer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. If the Committee on Accounts can make this unauthorized expenditure, we might bring in a resolution here to pay each Member of the House an additional salary of $2,500 out of the contingent fund of the House. Of course, they can not do that, and I do not see how they can create a new office. They create here an annual office out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CASSEL. No; they do not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question? Does the gentleman take the position that the House can not provide any additional clerical force for the committees without a general law—without the consent of the Senate and the Executive?

Mr. PAYNE. Congress having legislated upon the subject and provided annual clerks for committees, no.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The position of the gentleman is that the House as such has not the inherent or essential power to provide itself independently with all the equipment and service necessary for the discharge of its duties?

Mr. PAYNE. Not until the House has the power of legislation given to it with which to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York claims that this is not provided under the rule. Yet the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the rule:

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated:
* * * and the Committee on Accounts, on all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, while that is the rule of the House, here is something that proposes legislation in regard to an officer. It proposes an annual clerk where the law provides for no annual clerk.

Mr. OLMSTED. Not an annual clerk, but only for the balance of this session.

The SPEAKER. Yet the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the language of the resolution: .

That during the remainder of the present Congress, or until otherwise provided by law, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of a clerk to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a sum equal to the rate of $2,000 per annum, payable monthly.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, Mr. Speaker, if it limits it to the present session of the present Congress then I can see reason for the contention.

The SPEAKER. It is limited.

Mr. PAYNE. It says "or until otherwise provided by law," which has the effect of continuing the salary unless a law shall be provided during this Congress.

The SPEAKER. Not beyond the 4th day of March next, when the Congress will expire.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; but it does provide for the balance of this Congress, by its terms, for an annual clerk.

The SPEAKER. Is not that just what this House may do under this rule?

Mr. PAYNE. When it is not in contravention of law; but the rule can not do away with the law.

The SPEAKER. Well, but what law does it contravene?

Mr. PAYNE. There is a law providing annual clerks for certain committees. They are appropriated for in the appropriation bill. This proposes to make another clerk, an annual clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, in place of a session clerk.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair ask the gentleman would it not be in order, on a report of the Committee on Accounts—would it not be privileged—to pay one thousand or two thousand dollars for a clerk to a committee that has not a clerk even? In other words, under the rule, has not the House plenary powers over its contingent fund?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, when it is within the law, yes.

The SPEAKER. Well, but what law is in contravention with this?

Mr. PAYNE. I say there is no law providing for an annual clerk to this committee.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. The Chair will again say, take a committee that has no clerk; to illustrate, the Committee on Mileage, which, I believe, has no clerk. But let that be as it may; is not, under the rule, a resolution from the Committee on Accounts privileged that would provide $1,000 or $100 or $2,000 to be paid to a clerk during this Congress from the contingent fund? Would not that be in order?

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I do not think so. I do not think it would be in order no more than it would be in order to have an additional clerk for each Member of the House, allowing them to appoint them. Some one must appoint this annual clerk. They have legislation to that effect in this resolution. It is only expenditures that is privileged. It is not to create an office for the sake of making the expenditure. It is the expenditure itself that is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again read this resolution:

That during the remainder of the present Congress, or until otherwise provided for by law, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of a clerk to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a sum equal to the rate of $2,000 per annum, payable monthly.

Now, the effect of the resolution, if indorsed, would be to pay the clerk monthly at the rate of $2,000 per annum from the adoption of the resolution, from the contingent fund, until the 4th day of March next. It seems to the Chair that the resolution is privileged under the rules. It does not violate the privilege.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like a little time from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CASSEL. What time?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, five or ten minutes to discuss this, which is only a matter of a few thousand dollars.

Mr. CASSEL. It is not a matter of $2,000.

Mr. PAYNE. Wait a moment; let me finish my statement and then you will not have to contradict it. It is only a matter of a few thousand dollars, because I understand there are a number of these resolutions before the Committee on Accounts for a similar purpose—the idea of making annual clerks to committees that now and for years have gotten along with session clerks. Now, you take this Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. They have reported two important bills at this session of Congress. Their work is done upon those two important measures. Both of them have been passed by the House, and there is no excuse for this additional salary to be paid during the vacation of Congress. Now, I know it is an unpleasant thing to get up here and oppose extravagant expenditures by the House. It is hopeless almost, and it is a thankless task. It is a good deal like opposing an omnibus building bill or something of that kind; and still I beg this side of the House to reflect how the use of this contingent fund is constantly growing, and the fund itself growing, and the expenditures of the House growing from session to session. I think there ought to be some restraint put upon it. I think this is a good place to take a step in that direction, and give this committee what they have had heretofore, a clerk at $6 per day and not an annual clerk, to be followed up by a dozen—no one knows how many more—committees with similar appropriations to that provided for this; and I protest against the passage of this resolution.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, a statement or two. First, the contingent fund of the House has not been increased, nor has the Committee on Accounts authorized expenditures beyond the amount that has been appropriated, for the last eight or ten years. There is no question but that the necessities of the House, for clerical assistance, have become much greater during that time. There are many things that come before the committees of the House which are much more important than formerly. The volume of business is greater and the jurisdiction more important. The needs of this House and of its committees increase commensurately with the growth in membership here and with the growth of the country. Yet, notwithstanding the natural growth of both, we have exercised careful and economical oversight of the contingent fund of the House, and for this fiscal year have kept within the total amount usually appropriated for miscellaneous items—something like $75,000. Of this sum, however, only a comparatively small portion has been paid for salaries, and no new offices have been created or salaries or payments made until after the Committee on Accounts were satisfied, upon diligent inquiry and investigation, that they should be approved by the House. We have expended of the entire contingent fund for this year only $25,000 for actual salaries, all of it necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the House, and in some instances increases over current salaries which our committee and the House thought just and right in the interest of worthy and faithful employees.

The remainder of the contingent fund has been or will be expended to defray the expenses of special and select committees of the House—such as the investigation by the Printing Commission, the investigation of hazing by the Naval Committee, the St. Elizabeth asylum investigation, the investigation ordered by the House, but not yet conducted, of the Agricultural Department, and expenses in the contested-election case of Coudrey v. Wood, and in the case of Mr. Michalek, to determine his right to a seat in this House, all of which expenses were ordered paid by the House. We will also pay for reporting committee hearings. We have also paid the expenses in connection with the funerals of deceased Members and employees, paying the legal representatives of the latter in each case, as is customary, an amount equal to six months' salary, besides taking care of all other incidental and miscellaneous expenditures—such as for telephone service, rental of annex folding room, purchase of all supplies for committees and offices other than stationery, for laundry, and for numerous necessary odds and ends I will not take time to mention. And I want to say for the Committee on Accounts that we have given painstaking consideration to every proposition which has come before us, carefully scrutinizing each proposed expenditure, whether ordinary or unusual; and while the committee has been deluged in these last days of the session with many resolutions, we have exercised great care in their consideration and many of them still remain on our docket to be hereafter considered.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CASSEL. Just one minute. Let me explain that the chairman of this committee, as well as several others who have session clerks, do not have any secretaries during the time Congress is in session. Under the law they are deprived of their secretaries during the session. Consequently their secretaries must do both the work of clerk of the committee and that of secretary to the chairman in his representative capacity. After Congress adjourns there is piled upon them twice the amount of work which they ought to have. The employment as clerk to the committee ceases, but the work goes on. This resolution will correct this inequality and injustice in this particular case by giving the chairman a secretary such as the other Members of the House have. I do think that the chairmen of committees of as great importance as this and the other committee that will be covered by another resolution, are entitled to sufficient consideration to give them the clerical help which they need to transact their business.

Mr. PAYNE. Has this ever been done before, in regard to this committee?

Mr. CASSEL. In regard to this committee it has not.

Mr. PAYNE. Then this is an increase, is it not?

Mr. CASSEL. It is.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, is it not a fact that while the fund has not been increased by appropriation, the appropriation bills have provided for the payment of the salaries of officers, created by this committee, and provided for them otherwise than from the contingent fund? For instance, the number of the official reporters to committees has been increased, so that the demand upon the contingent fund for official reporting of committees by outside reporting firms has been thereby made less than it otherwise would be. And so in regard to offices that have been created by the action of this committee. The Committee on Appropriations have appropriated specifically for their salary, and in that way the demand upon the contingent fund has been lessened.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CASSEL. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] five minutes.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is any argument against this proposition that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has had no annual clerk heretofore. It is known to everybody that this committee is growing in importance. Some committees decrease in importance. and I call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to the fact that the great committee over which he presides with so much ability is not as important in this Congress as it has been in other Congresses. Why, it is well known that the amount of work performed by the Ways and Means Committee in this Congress, and for the past seven years, for that matter, has been insignificant, and yet I believe that committee has as many clerks as it ever had. Now, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has grown in importance in the last few years. While I only have knowledge of the work of that committee as other Members of the House have, yet I know that the work performed by the Immigration Committee in this Congress and in the last Congress is very great. There were hearings day after day, week after week, month after month, and yet this committee is without the necessary clerical assistance. I want to say further that no committee in this House has performed a better work at this session of Congress than has the Committee on Immigration. The bill to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, reported by this committee at this session, and a bill which I heartily approve, is the highest proof of the amount and importance of the work of that committee. This clerk is necessary, and I hope the resolution will pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I also am directed to report the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the remainder of the present Congress, or until otherwise provided for by law, there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, for the services of a clerk to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, a sum equal to the rate of $2,000 per annum, payable monthly: Provided, That so much of the resolution adopted December 19, 1905, as assigned a session clerk to said committee is hereby vacated.

The resolution was agreed to.

GRANTING LOS ANGELES RIGHTS OF WAY OVER CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. McLACHLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6443) granting to the city of Los Angeles, Cal., rights of way over and through certain public lands, and over and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timber Land Reserve, in the State of California, and for other purposes, and I ask that the Clerk read the substitute recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Amend said bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

"That there is hereby granted to the city of Los Angeles, Cal., a municipal corporation of the State of California, all necessary rights of way, not to exceed 250 feet in width, over and through the public lands of the United States in the counties of Inyo, Kern, and Los Angeles, State of California, and over and through the Sierra and Santa Barbara forest reserves and the San Gabriel Timber Land Reserve, in said State, for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, and conduits for conveying water to the city of Los Angeles, and for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining power and electric plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electric energy, together with such lands as the Secretary of the Interior may deem to be actually necessary for power houses, diverting and storage dams and reservoirs, and necessary buildings and structures to be used in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of said water, power, and electric plants, whenever said city shall have filed, as hereinafter provided, and the same shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way for the purposes hereinabove set forth.

"SEC. 2. That within one year after the passage of this act the city of Los Angeles shall file with the registers of the United States land offices in the districts where the lands traversed by said rights of way are located, a map or maps showing the boundaries, locations, and extent of said proposed rights of way, for the purposes stated in section 1 of this act; but no construction work shall be commenced on said land until said map or maps have been filed as herein provided and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That any changes of location of said rights of way may be made by said city of Los Angeles, within two years after the filing of said map or maps, by filing such additional map or maps as may be necessary to show such changes of location, said additional map or maps to be filed in the same manner as the original map or maps; and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior of said map or maps showing changes of location of said rights of way shall operate as an abandonment by the city of Los Angeles to the extent of such change or changes, of the rights of way indicated on the original maps: And provided further, That any rights inuring to the city of Los Angeles under this act shall, on the approval of the map or maps referred to herein by the Secretary of the Interior, relate back to the date of the filing of said map or maps with the register of the United States land office as provided herein.

"SEC. 3. That the rights of way hereby granted shall not be effective over any land upon which homestead, mining, or other existing valid claims shall have been filed or made until the city of Los Angeles shall have procured proper relinquishments of all such entries and claims, or acquired title by due process of law and just compensation paid to said entrymen or claimants and caused proper evidence of such fact to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That this act shall not apply to any lands embraced in rights of way heretofore approved under any act of Congress, nor affect the adjudication of any pending applications for rights of way by the owner or owners of existing water rights and that no private right, title, interest, or claim of any person, persons, or corporation, in or to any of the lands traversed by or embraced in said right of way shall be interfered with or abridged, except with the consent of the owner or owners or claimant or claimants thereof, or by due process of law, and just compensation paid to such owner or claimant.

"SEC. 4. That the city of Los Angeles shall conform to all regulations adopted and prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture governing the forest reserves, and shall not take, cut, or destroy any timber within the forest reserves, except such as may be actually necessary to remove to construct its power plants and structures, poles and flumes, storage dams and reservoirs, and it shall pay to the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture the full value of all timber and wood cut, used, or destroyed on any of the rights of way and lands within forest reserves hereby granted: Provided further, That the city shall construct and maintain in good repair bridges or other practicable crossings over its rights of way within the forest reserves when and where directed in writing by the Forester of the United States Department of Agriculture, and elsewhere on public lands along the line of said works, as required by the Secretary of the Interior; and said grantee shall, as said waterworks are completed, if directed by the Secretary of the Interior, construct and maintain along each side of said right of way a lawful fence, as defined by the laws of the State of California, with such lanes or crossings for domestic animals as the aforesaid officers shall require: Provided further, That the city of Los Angeles shall clear its rights of way within forest reserves of any débris or inflammable material as directed by the Forester of the United States Department of Agriculture: Provided further, That the said city shall allow any wagon road which it may construct within forest reserves to be freely used by forest officers and the officers of the Interior Department and by the public, and shall allow to the Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture and to the officers of the Interior Department, for official business only, the free use of any telephones, telegraphs, or electric railroads it may construct and maintain within the forest reserves or on the public lands, together with the right to connect with any such telephone lines private telephone wires for the exclusive use of said Forest Service or of the Interior Department: And provided further, That the Forest Service may, within forest reserves, protect, use, and administer said land and resources within said rights of way under forest-reserve laws and regulations, but in so doing must not interfere with the full enjoyment of the rights of way by the city of Los Angeles: And provided further, That in the event that the Secretary of the Interior shall abandon the project known as the Owens River project for the irrigation of lands in Inyo County, Cal., under the act of June 17, 1902, the city of Los Angeles, in said State, is to pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the account of the reclamation fund established by said act, the amount expended for preliminary surveys, examinations, and river measurements, not exceeding $14,000, and in consideration of said payment the said city of Los Angeles is to have the benefit of the use of the maps and field notes resulting from said surveys, examinations, and river measurements, and the preference right to acquire at any time within three years from the approval of this act any lands now reserved by the United States under the terms of said reclamation act in connection with said project necessary for storage or right-of-way purposes, upon filing with the register and receiver of the land office in the land district where any such lands sought to be acquired are situated a map showing the lands desired to be acquired, and upon the approval of said map or maps by the Secretary of the Interior, and upon the payment of $1.25 per acre to the receiver of said land office title to said land so reserved and filed on shall vest in said city of Los Angeles, and such title shall be and remain in said city only for the purposes aforesaid, and shall revert to the United States in the event of the abandonment thereof for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, however, That the terms of this act shall not apply to any lands upon Bishop Creek or its branches in said county of Inyo.

"SEC. 5. That all lands over which the rights of way mentioned in this act shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such easements: Provided, however, That if construction of said waterworks shall not have been begun in good faith within five years from the date of approval of this act, or if after such period of five years there shall be a cessation of such construction for a period of three consecutive years, then all rights hereunder shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 6. That the city of Los Angeles is prohibited from ever selling or letting to any corporation or individual, except a municipality, the right for such corporation or individual to sell or sublet the water sold or given to it or him by the city.

"SEC. 7. That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this act at any time is hereby reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask my colleague if this bill gives any rights to water or apportions it in any way?

Mr. McLACHLAN. It does not attempt to dispose of any water rights whatever. It simply grants rights of way over the public domain for the waters of the city of Los Angeles, which they now own.

Mr. NEEDHAM. The question of water rights is to be settled entirely by the State law?

Mr. McLACHLAN. Entirely by the State law.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McLACHLAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HARBOR AT MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20290) amending the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to modify the conditions of the plan for the improvement of the inner harbor of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., as set forth in paragraph 28 of House Document No. 120, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session, and authorized by the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, by omitting from said plan the turning basin at the head of navigation on the Kinnickinnic River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OTJEN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the consideration of the general deficiency appropriation bill, now pending in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it shall be in order to consider points of order notwithstanding the paragraph relating to the ratification of the Philippine tariff, page 4, lines 17 to 26, and page 5, lines 1 and 2, as follows, viz:

"That the tariff duties, both import and export, imposed by the authorities of the United States or of the provisional military government thereof in the Philippine Islands prior to March 8, 1902, at all ports and places in said islands upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said islands from the United States, or from foreign countries, or exported from said islands, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the collection of all such duties prior to March 8, 1902, is hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same had by prior act of Congress been specifically authorized and directed."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, upon that I demand the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 130, noes 77.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the urgent deficiency bill now under consideration by the House contains this paragraph, and I desire especially to call the attention of the House to its terms:

That the tariff duties, both import and export, imposed by the authorities of the United States or of the provisional military government thereof in the Philippine Islands prior to March 8, 1902, at all ports and places in said islands upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said islands from the United States, or from foreign countries, or exported from said islands, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the collection of all such duties prior to March 8, 1902, is hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same had by prior act of Congress been specifically authorized and directed.

To that paragraph a point of order was made that it was new legislation, and that point of order was sustained. If the resolution now pending be adopted, this paragraph will be restored to the urgent deficiency bill and then be the subject of debate just as if it had been in the bill originally. Mr. Speaker, just a word or two with respect to the reasons why this legislation is necessary. On the 12th of July, 1898, while the war with Spain was in progress, President McKinley issued an order imposing import and export duties upon goods going into or coming out of the Philippine Islands. The treaty of peace was ratified on the 11th of April, 1899. Of course so far as the customs duties are concerned that we collected between the date of the order of President McKinley and the ratification of the treaty there could be no question. The duties, however, continued to be collected under the McKinley order, and a number of amendments thereto, up until March 8, 1902, when Congress enacted the first Philippine tariff bill. It is claimed that the duties collected subsequent to the ratification of the treaty of peace were without authority of law, and on the 1st day of July, 1902, the Congress passed an act ratifying and legalizing all the duties that had been collected subsequent to the McKinley order and up to the date of the passage of that act. The question was raised as to whether or not this act of the 1st of July, 1902, operated as Congress thought it would operate, to legalize and ratify the imposition and the collection of these customs duties. Several cases were brought against the United States to recover back the duties paid under the McKinley order, and the Supreme Court held that the act of 1902, July 1, did not extend so far as to legalize all of the duties collected. After that decision a petition was filed upon the part of the United States calling the attention of the court to the fact, as the attorney for the United States believed, that the court in its decision had overlooked the amendments to the McKinley order, and a rehearing was granted upon the question as to whether Congress by the act of July 1, 1902, ratified the collection of the sums sought to be recovered in those suits. On that rehearing the court held that the act of 1902 was not sufficient to cover all the customs duties that had been collected prior to the passage of the first Philippine tariff act by Congress. The necessity, therefore, arises, if Congress believes that those duties were properly collected, to supplement the act of July 1, 1902, by the legislation which is included in the paragraph that is now proposed to be put upon the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. Speaker, there are legal questions involved that I have not now time to discuss within the limited time allowed for a discussion on the adoption of the rule, but abundant opportunity will be afforded to discuss them and they will be appropriate to be discussed when the rule shall have been adopted and the paragraph is inserted in the bill. I trust that the rule, therefore, will pass and the opportunity be afforded for that discussion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if there was a stipulation or agreement that the cases of these claimants should abide the decision in the case the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. DALZELL. I know of no such agreement.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat I wish he would tell the House whether this matter was ever brought to the attention of Congress by a bill properly introduced and sent to the Judiciary Committee, either of the House or of the Senate.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know. I have no knowledge on the subject.

Mr. SHERLEY. It struck me as peculiar that a technical matter of this kind should be determined in this way, and that there might have been some such action taken.

Mr. DALZELL. I have no knowledge on the subject.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman know the amount of the claims now filed?

Mr. DALZELL. Claims have been filed now to the amount of nearly $3,000,000, but those claims represent only customs duties paid upon goods that came from the United States. If this legislation should fail, the amount of claims would be something like $15,000,000.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Has the gentleman any doubt himself as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation?

Mr. DALZELL. Not a bit; I have no doubt about it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Speaker to rap me down at the end of five minutes. Mr. Speaker, upon July 12, 1898, the executive department of the Federal Government undertook to legislate into existence tariff acts between the Philippine Islands and the United States and also to legislate into existence taxation in the Philippines under the guise of its being an exercise of the war power. This was a usurpation of legislative power by the Executive. This was in the opinion of many of us at that time, and we asserted that opinion, a clear act of executive usurpation.

Later the Supreme Court of the United States decided, what it seems to me ought to have been plain to any man who was born and reared in an American atmosphere, to wit, that the executive department of the Government could not pass taxation laws, but that the Congress of the United States, being the legislative department, alone could do that. The Supreme Court decided that the acts of the Executive in that far were usurpatory and invalid, not using that language so far as the first word goes, but that they were invalid, and being invalid of course they were usurpatory. Then by the act of July 1, 1902, the second section of it, Congress undertook to cure that, but upon a rehearing asked by the Government the Supreme Court of the United States decided that it had not been cured. Some of these taxes were resisted and were not paid. Other suits were brought and were in process of determination when the United States Supreme Court decided.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says he does not know whether or not any of those cases were made test cases. I inform the House now that one of the counsel in one of those cases (and the gentleman from Massachusetts in a few moments will read what he said) asserted most positively that by agreement with the Solicitor they were made test cases. Now, then, this rule is for the purpose of making germane to this bill a proposition which otherwise would not be germane, and which, if carried by the House, amounts simply to this, to confirm and ratify a usurpatory and invalid act of the executive department of the Federal Government and to cut off from their right to a remedy in the courts of the United States the people who were injured by that act. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall yield——

Mr. DALZELL. I do not know anything about this alleged agreement; but does the gentleman from Mississippi hold that the Attorney-General of the United States could make an agreement that would bind Congress not to legislate in a matter of this kind?

Mr. WILLIAMS I do not; of course I hold no such thing; but as you were asked the question and you replied to it, I replied to your reply; but I do hold that a great Government ought to be equal in good morals and in the observance of good faith to the humblest citizen in the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, how much of my five minutes have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining of his five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield eleven minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in the treatment of claims of citizens of the United States by this Government many of us must have felt little to sanction in our consciences. It is regarded by many Members as amounting almost to a national scandal. The case we have to discuss here to-day will be a national scandal if this rule is adopted and the legislation it brings in order is passed, and it will be not only a scandal which reflects upon us here in the United States, but one which will reflect upon us in every quarter of the globe, for not only are the rights of citizens of the United States involved, but also those of citizens of England, Germany, Spain, and Switzerland, countries with which we are at peace, and which we ought to respect. In a word, if the action of the majority is followed here to-day you will vote to establish injustice rather than justice; you will vote to repudiate a debt which the highest court of the United States has established by a solemn decree; you will vote to confirm the title of the United States to money belonging to citizens, according to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, what are the facts? On the 12th of July, 1898, during the war with Spain, President McKinley issued an order providing for the collection of taxes in such ports and places in the Philippine Islands as fell under the American arms. On the 11th of April, 1899, the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States was proclaimed. Notwithstanding that, customs duties on exports and imports were collected until the 8th of March, 1902, when the revenue act for the islands, passed by Congress, went into effect. In 1900 suits were brought in the Court of Claims for the payment of duties alleged to have been collected illegally. On the 12th of July, 1901, Congress passed an act the second section of which was thought to have ratified and made legal the collection of duties in the Philippine Islands in this period. The suits were decided against the claimants in the Court of Claims. Thereupon two of them were appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and under an agreement between the Government and those claimants they were made as test cases, and the Government's counsel stated to the Supreme Court that all cases then filed in the Court of Claims would be governed by the decision of the Supreme Court in the test cases.

On the 20th and 26th of May, 1905, two lists, giving the names of the claimants and the amount of the claims pending in the Court of Claims, were filed with the Supreme Court by the Attorney-General, in order to show to that court what the consequences of its decision would be. In addition to that there was an agreement that the cases in the Court of Claims should be held in abeyance pending the decision of the Supreme Court, and I shall insert in my remarks at the close a letter from Mr. Pradt, one of the counsel for the United States, to an attorney for the claimant, which demonstrates absolutely that the Government took such action as to prevent the perfecting of their rights by claimants against the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I can not yield now, as I have only ten minutes.

Now, on the 3d of April, 1905, the Supreme Court decided these test cases—Warner, Barnes & Co., and the Lincoln case—and it has disposed of the defense of the United States by the decision that there was no state of war existing in the Philippine Islands upon which the military order of the President could be lawfully predicated; and, secondly, that the second section of the act of July 1, 1902, did not in fact, regardless of the question of whether it was so intended, ratify and make legal the collection of these duties. In that case every question brought forward by the Government was patiently and fully considered by the Supreme Court. Later, in 1905, the Government asked a rehearing, and the court again heard the Government's contention, and again it decided that the act of July 1, 1902, did not ratify and give validity to the collection of the taxes in the Philippine Islands which were the subject of the controversy before the court.

Now, then, as it is the statement of the Attorney-General to that court that cases pending in the Court of Claims would be governed by the decision of the Supreme Court, we must in equity deal with those cases in the Court of Claims upon the same footing as we deal with the two test cases that were actually before the Supreme Court in which judgment has been entered.

What will be the effect of this legislation? The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] admitted yesterday that it was the purpose of the legislation to defeat the claims, not only of those who had paid taxes and had not brought suit, but also of those who had brought suit, but in which suits no judgments had been entered. Now, then, this legislation will affect not only our citizens, but the citizens of foreign countries which throw their own courts open to us, allow our citizens to get judgments against such governments, and allow the decisions of those courts to be carried out by the executive departments of those governments. We are asked by the adoption of this rule to nullify two solemn decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We are asked to nullify the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that the property of the citizen may not be taken without due process of law and without just compensation. We are asked to establish a precedent which may work hardship to citizens of our own land in their dealings with foreign governments later on, and no man ought to vote for this rule who would be prepared to sanction this state of things.

Suppose that exporters from the United States send goods to the port of Hamburg, in Germany. Suppose taxes are levied upon them there unlawfully. Suppose a test suit were brought in and decided by the highest court of Germany, upholding the contention of American citizens and confirming their title to the money they had been unlawfully compelled to pay. Suppose the German Government would then pass an act in its Parliament defeating the decisions of its highest court, which had established the rights of American citizens in that country. Is there a man in this House who would not burn with indignation against that repudiation by Germany of the judgment of its own courts in its dealings with American citizens? [Applause.] If a weak power—as, for example, Venezuela—should deal with our citizens in such a manner, what man is there upon this floor who would not invoke the war power of this nation in order to compel Venezuela to do justice to our citizens in response to the mandate of its highest court?

Now, the gentleman who is not willing to sanction that course of procedure ought not by his vote to-day sanction the procedure which the majority asks us to adopt. I say that it is not a mere question of ratification. It is a question of whether you will strike down those constitutional guaranties which are the safeguards of property and the bulwarks of civilization in this land. It is not a mere question of the number of claimants or the amount of the claims involved. It is not a question merely of good faith between the law officers of the Government and these claimants who have come properly before our courts. It goes beyoud that.

It is a question whether you shall repudiate the decree of the Supreme Court that has confirmed the property rights of citizens to money which has been unlawfully collected by the Government of the United States. In the last analysis it is a question whether you shall by your vote here to-day cast a stain upon the honor of this Republic and make it a byword and a reproach in every civilized capital in every quarter of the globe; whether you shall discard all partisan considerations, improperly injected into this debate, and join with us here and now in opposing a measure that attacks not merely the courts of the United States, but the very honor of this Republic. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask unanimous consent to insert the letter and documents showing the agreement as to cases pending in the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter and documents are as follows:

[Copy of a letter written by Hon. L. A. Pradt, former Assistant Attorney-General in charge of Court of Claims, to Henry M. Ward, one of the attorneys for claimants in the Philippine tariff cases.]

1410 H STREET NW., WASHINGTON, D. C.,
June 27, 1906.

Mr. H. M. WARD, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WARD: In response to your inquiry as to my recollection regarding the understanding which was had between yourself and other attorneys for claimants in the Philippine tariff cases and myself, as Assistant Attorney-General in charge of the defense of those cases, I have to say that after the decision of the Court of Claims adverse to the claimants in the Warner Barnes case, and the appeal to the Supreme Court which followed, there was no attempt made by claimants to prove the amounts of duties for which a refund was claimed in the other cases, all of which were then filed, as I recollect; and any such move would have been useless, since the court, according to its unwritten rule, would have sustained the objection which I should, of course, have made to such procedure, because of the pendency of the test case in the Supreme Court. After the Supreme Court had reversed the decision of the Court of Claims in the Warner Barnes case arrangements had about been completed for the appointment of an auditor to report the facts to the court in the other cases, when the motion for a rehearing was made, whereupon, by mutual consent, all further proceedings were suspended pending the result of the motion. If you and your associates had not so agreed, I should have asked the court to make an order to that effect, and the motion would certainly have prevailed.

Yours, very truly, L. A. PRADT.

In the Supreme Court of the United States, October term, 1904. Frederick W. Lincoln et al., plaintiffs in error, v. The United States. No. 149. Warner, Barnes & Co. (Limited), appellant, v. The United States. No. 466.

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING—CORRECTION AS TO STATEMENT OF CLAIMS FILED.

We inform the court that our statement of claims filed is erroneous in that we assumed the amounts to be in American currency, whereas many are in Mexican dollars. Furthermore, the list submitted to the court contained some claims of export duties and other items not involving the import tariff at all or imports from foreign countries. The list has now been carefully revised and corrected, and is appended hereto in accurate form. Claims on imports from Spain have been retained because of the provision of the treaty (Art. IV) that "the United States will, for the term of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States."

The information originally given us led us to think that either the claims expressed in American currency on their face or that they had been reduced to that currency before the list was transmitted to us. We have just discovered these mistakes (which were inadvertent), and hasten to apprise the court that the amount of refunds due under the decision will not be $7,650,164.48, as stated, but somewhat less than half that amount, viz, $3,485,328.74.

This total does not include the particular claim of Warner, Barnes & Co. before the court, amounting to $81,126.65, nor the Lincoln claim, amounting to $713.42, and it is proper to add that the number and amount of claims, like the Lincoln claim, pending in other Federal courts than the Court of Claims, is at present unknown.

It is unnecessary to say that we had no intention or desire to exaggerate the consequences of the decision, and it is manifest that, allowing for the error made, the sum of money at stake is large enough to justify fully our previous references to the money importance of the issue.

Mr. DALZELL. How is the time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi has five minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania twelve.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman use his five minutes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman use the balance of his time in one speech?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio—all to be used in one speech, I think.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question? Following the statement of the case presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I take it that the fact that these moneys have been collected is conceded, and that the Supreme Court has held that collection was illegal.

Mr. DALZELL. No; not necessarily.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman dispute that question of fact?

Mr. DALZELL. It is in dispute.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do you dispute that the Supreme Court had held——

Mr. DALZELL. I assume and assert that the matter is still within the power of Congress to regulate.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is not exactly my question. It was whether the Supreme Court had held in a suit, in the absence of this legislation by Congress, that the collection was illegal.

Mr. DALZELL. The Supreme Court has held that the act that Congress passed intended to ratify and legalize the collection of these taxes did not legalize and ratify the collection of all of them; that some of them were not covered by the order under which they were collected.

Mr. COCKRAN. So that the object of this legislation now is to make legal what at the present time is without warrant of law?

Mr. DALZELL. The object of this legislation is that Congress now shall do what it had the power to do, even if it did not before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But in the absence of doing, the Executive did. Will the gentlemen on the other side conclude their remarks in one speech?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That will be the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is whether the House will adopt a rule to authorize the consideration of a provision already reported upon an appropriation bill. That that is a provision that requires careful consideration, and ample consideration by some committee of the House, is apparent from the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It has never received consideration from any committee of the House. It was hurriedly placed upon the appropriation bill, and it will receive scant consideration from the Committee of the Whole House. It is asserted in justification that it was the intention of Congress in the act of July, 1902, to ratify all the taxes collected under the Executive order. Let me read what the Supreme Court said on the 28th of May:

> Moreover, the act of July, 1902, was passed with full knowledge and after careful consideration of the decision of this court, and Congress was aware that grave doubt, at least, had been thrown upon its power to ratify the taxes under circumstances like the present.

I read now from the De Lima case, to which Justice Fuller refers, in which Mr. Justice Brown said, referring to the act applying to the revenues collected from Porto Rico:

> * * * Perhaps we might go further, and say that so far as these duties were paid voluntarily and without protest, the legality of that payment was entitled to be recognized; but it could have no retroactive effect as to money paid under protest, for which action to recover back had already been brought.

And this provision is for the cases in which actions have already been brought.

> To say that Congress could by subsequent act deprive them of the right to prosecute this action would be beyond its power. In any event, it should not be interpreted so as to make it retroactive.

Now, then, with this decision of the Supreme Court, this House is asked to take the chance that this provision to confiscate property to which the Supreme Court has already decided litigants are entitled will by some means be sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I am opposed to legislation which has the effect to nullify a decision of the Supreme Court, made in cases intended as tests, in actions then pending. I do not believe that the mere fact that a large sum of money, three or four million dollars, is involved is sufficient to justify Gongress in such an act, constituting at the least bad faith. If our courts have decided that in the administration of the public affairs money has been illegally exacted from citizens or from aliens, then the highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that the Government shall refund to those from whom these moneys have been illegally exacted that to which they are entitled, and no condition of affairs confronts this country that would justify the confiscation of this property.

In my judgment legislation of this character should be considered either by the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Ways and Means, or the committee which has jurisdiction of tariff matters with the Philippines, or at least properly considered by some committee, and the result of its deliberations submitted to the House for its advice and action. Then the House could act intelligently and properly. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCKRAN. Is the effect of this resolution, if adopted, to place this amendment before the Committee of the Whole for its discussion and adoption or rejection, or does the adoption of this rule ipso facto adopt the proposition itself?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will notice the rule, it merely makes it in order to consider the proposition in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—that and that only.

Mr. DALZELL. This puts the paragraph that went out on a point of order back again.

Mr. COCKRAN. It throws it all open to the committee?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question. It is a question of law, a question of proper legislation, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says it is a question of honor. The interior facts of this case can be very briefly stated. A set of importers and exporters, mainly foreigners, the list of whose names I can not read because I can not pronounce them, imported into this country and imported into the Philippine Islands large amounts of goods, sold them with the duties added, and pocketed their profits. Now they are seeking to recover back the duties, and do not make any proposition to give back to the people who paid the duties any part of the money. There is a large sum involved, and some of the biggest lawyers in New York, and perhaps Massachusetts, are engaged in the prosecution of these claims. I have here a list of the attorneys. Under the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that France is involved, and that Germany is involved in it, and that Spain is involved in it, it becomes a matter that ought to be very carefully and cautiously considered by the Congress of the United States.

The reason why this claim did not come to the Committee on Appropriations in time for its consideration is made very plain and easily understood when you recognize the fact that the decision necessitating this action of Congress was not rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States until the 28th day of May last, less than a month ago, probably not many days if at all prior to the time when the Committee on Appropriations were engaged in the work of constructing the general deficiency bill. So if there was any lack of ample consideration by the committee at the time they agreed to put this proposition into the bill, it is not a new question, nevertheless. It has been discussed by the Cabinet of the President; the distinguished Secretary of War has presented his views over and over again in writing, and has made a very strong contention through the Attorney-General's office in favor of the position now taken by the Government. So much now for the importance of the matter.

What is sought by the adoption of this rule? It is simply to give to the House of Representatives jurisdiction to try and determine the propriety of this legislation. Surely this House will not shrink from the duty of trying this question; and upon the ex parte statement by counsel—I beg pardon, by gentlemen on the other side—the Administration is called to a hearing and a trial before this Congress.

Mr. SHERLEY. What effort, if any, was made to get this matter considered by the Judiciary Committee, the committee that ordinarily would have jurisdiction of it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I give it up. I do not know.

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you not think it somewhat extraordinary, in the closing hours of this session of Congress, to give consideration of this important matter in this way, without any consideration by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all. Ordinarily the point of the gentleman might be well taken, but under existing circumstances the Government has argued this case in all its aspects before the highest tribunal of the country, and we have the opinion of the country that we believe fully justifies this legislation. So that it would have been an idle process to have sent this matter to the Judiciary Committee for their opinion, when we had the opinion of the law department of the Government on our side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the gentleman, this is in the nature of an appeal from the Supreme Court?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the gentleman understands how near this is in the nature of an appeal from the Supreme Court. It is no appeal from the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court simply pointed out that the legislation of Congress did not cover what Congress understood it was to cover, and at the same time we have the authorities here to show when the proper time comes that Congress had the undoubted power at the time, and now has, to exercise that power and to leave to the parties on the other side who are seeking this enormous graft upon the Treasury of the United States—to let them proceed with their cases and meet the proposition of the Government that we will put into this bill if this order is agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman know whether there is any statute of limitations that would bar these claimants if they had delayed bringing suit, awaiting the decision of the Warren-Barnes case?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know. I think the suits are all filed, and I think we have the contract showing who is to get the bigger part of the money—the friends of the gentleman from New York——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from New York does not think I make any reflection upon him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think the gentleman does, but the language might.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I will put it mountains strong that I meant nothing of the sort.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Did not Chief Justice Fuller in his opinion on the rehearing say that Congress had an opportunity to consider the case?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not want the gentleman to take up my time. I have no doubt that the judge of the court delivering the opinion did put it on the ground that Congress had had an opportunity and might have done more than it did, and that they did not do all that they thought they were doing. But at the same time we claim that we have abundant authority to show that the present action of Congress will retroact and validate the position we have taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the court does not say anything of the kind.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If that is so, then these importers are not harmed. If it is not true that Congress hadn't power then and has the power now, then your suits will go on to judgment, and if this legislation is not enacted, then the United States is barred and the Treasury will be plundered $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, so the wrong will be inflicted against the Government and not against the claimants.

Mr. WALDO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. WALDO. The gentleman spoke of some contract by which a large amount, if recovered, is going to some one else. Has the gentleman any objection to stating who those men are?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I have. I like to have lawyers get big fees and plenty of them, especially when they are coming out of foreign importers.

Mr. WALDO. It would seem, unless the act is passed, that the 50 or 60 per cent you are talking about would come out of the United States and not out of the foreign importers.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It will all come out of the United States.

Mr. COCKRAN. Out of the Philippine treasury.

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are taking the money, every dollar of it most, out of the Treasury now. I hope the House will pass this resolution and let us thrash it out, so as to get at what is really the rights in the premises.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 111, noes 68.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 82, answered "present" 15, not voting 128, as follows:

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 20403—the general deficiency bill, Mr. CRUMPACKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday there was pending a point of order to the paragraph in the bill on page 23 beginning on line 10 and extending to and including line 24. The paragraph carries an appropriation to reimburse the State of Texas for moneys expended by that State in defending its frontier against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations prior to June 20, 1860. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] that there is no law authorizing an appropriation for the payment of the claim. Under the rules of the House no provision can be carried in a general appropriation bill for the payment of a claim against the Government of the United States unless the payment of the claim is clearly authorized by existing law. In the case now under consideration the State of Texas a number of years ago expended a considerable sum of money in defending its borders against invasion, primarily for the protection of its own citizens, but in doing that the State performed a duty that under the Federal Constitution belonged to the United States Government. There was no law then and there is no law now authorizing the reimbursement of States that expend funds in the execution of a service of the character mentioned.

In 1859 and in 1860 Congress made appropriations covering portions of the claim of the State of Texas included in the paragraph under consideration. In 1859 the appropriation was for the expense of six companies of State militia for a period of three months. In 1860 Congress extended the provisions of the law of 1859 so as to cover all the troops of the State of Texas that were engaged in defending the frontier, the State militia and the rangers, limiting the amount, however, to about $123,000. Those are the only acts of legislation that Congress ever made upon the subject. The apropriations were not drawn by the State, and under the operation of a general statute lapsed and were covered into the Treasury. In the general deficiency bill for 1905 a provision was incorporated directing the Secretary of War to inquire into and report to Congress for its consideration what sums of money were actually expended by the State of Texas during the period between February 28, 1855, and June 21, 1860, in payment of State volunteers or rangers called into service by authority of the government of Texas in defense of the frontier of that State against Mexican marauders and Indian depredations, for which reimbursement has not been made out of the Treasury of the United States.

The original acts of Congress appropriating money for the reimbursement of the State did not cover the entire claim that is contained in the paragraph under consideration, and therefore it is not necessary for the Chair to determine whether those appropriation acts—the appropriations having lapsed and been covered into the Treasury—constitute a continuing liability on the part of the Government for the payment of the claim or whether they were coupled with the appropriations and ceased to operate after the appropriations lapsed. If there is any law for the payment of this claim, it is contained in the provision the Chair just quoted in the general deficiency act for the fiscal year 1905. The question is whether by that provision Congress created a legal liability upon the United States for the payment of this claim. The Chair is of the opinion that the provision did not create such liability. The Secretary of War was directed to inquire into the claim and report "for the consideration of Congress"—not for payment, but "for the consideration of Congress." The language fairly implies that Congress intended to further consider the question in the light of any new facts that might be developed by the investigation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Pardon me just there for one moment. I agree with the Chair that the War Department reported this matter for consideration. Now, I make this suggestion to the Chair, that if you sustain the point of order you defeat the purpose for which the War Department made the investigation, and you defeat the purpose of Congress in setting out the request to the War Department in 1905. You stop the consideration—just the thing we want done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that when Congress creates a commission to make an investigation of a particular subject or authorizes a Department to make such investigation for the consideration of Congress, that act does not commit the Federal Government to the project. The investigation is for information to enable Congress to intelligently determine what the position of the Government shall be in reference to the matter.

The investigation made by the Secretary of War was for the information of Congress. Congress, in the light of the investigation, was supposed to act upon the question of liability and decide whether the Government should assume the payment of the claim. Merely ordering the investigation did not amount to an assumption of the claim by the Government. Congress has the right to assume and pay the claim, but under the rules of the House a general appropriation bill can not carry a provision for its payment until Congress, by suitable action, has legally committed the Government to its payment. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that Congress did not create a legal liability on the part of the Government to pay the claim by the provision in the act of 1905, and therefore the Committee on Appropriations had no right to incorporate in this bill a provision for its payment

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Did not the action of the House in referring this matter to the War Department in 1905, and the action of the War Department, in its report, returning it to the House, put that matter before Congress on its merits? And will not the sustaining of the point of order rob Congress of testing this matter on its merits?

The CHAIRMAN. It may have put the whole question before the Congress on its merits, but in distributing the business of the House under the rules appropriate committees investigate questions on their merits and report measures for action by the House; but the Committee on Appropriations, in making up general bills, is not supposed to investigate questions upon their merits, but to appropriate for objects authorized by law, the merits of which have been investigated by other committees and by Congress. A few years ago a provision similar to the one under consideration was incorporated in the naval appropriation bill, a provision authorizing the appointment of a commission to select a site for a naval training station on the Great Lakes and to ascertain the cost of the site and report to Congress. That commission was appointed and made a report, selecting a site and reporting the cost of the site to Congress. In the following naval appropriation bill a proposition was embodied providing an appropriation for the establishment of the naval training station, and a point of order was made against the provision and sustained on the ground that the creation of the commission for the purpose of investigating the question did not commit the Government to the project at all, but that it was only for the enlightenment of Congress. The Chair regards that decision directly in point, so far as the principle is concerned. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under the chief signal officer: For the purpose of replacing signal stores and equipments destroyed by fire while on storage in warehouse at Arlington Dock, Seattle, Wash., May 7, 1906, to be made available during the fiscal years 1906 and 1907, $15,000.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, after line 16, insert:

"QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

"Regular supplies: For regular supplies for the Quartermaster's Department on account of the fiscal year 1906, including all objects mentioned under this head in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, $500,000."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, in justice to the committee some explanation for the insertion of so large an item should be given. Its necessity arises for the reason that a submission sent to the Senate did not reach the House. The Secretary of War, through the Secretary of the Treasury, on January 30 of this year, sent a communication to the Senate that there would be a deficiency or that there was required for deficiency under the title of "Regular supplies, Quartermaster's Department," $600,000. Since the bill has been before the House the Secretary of War communicated with us, advising us that $374,000 has already been contracted for. The law gives the right to the War Department to contract for necessary expenditures of this character and $500,000 will be necessary to cover the deficiencies thus arising under the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, what is this difference between the $374,000 and $500,000 for?

Mr. TAWNEY. The difference between $375,000 and $500,000 is to meet the payment of bills or obligations now outstanding, but which will come in after the close of the fiscal year. The Quartermaster-General estimates that that will not be sufficient to meet those bills by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LITTAUER. The submission was $600,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then practically the whole sum is outstanding obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse William H. Green for loss of time and doctor's fees on account of injury from an accident while employed at the House of Representatives Office Building, $250.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order upon that item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have nothing to say against the point of order, Mr. Chairman; it is plainly subject to it. The man was injured in Government work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that no committee has recommended any such appropriations as this, and there are a number of men continually being injured on public work.

Mr. LITTAUER. No committee has recommended this except the Committee on Appropriations. It was submitted to the committee by the superintendent of buildings and grounds in charge of this work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a very poor reason to depart from the rule. I have a great number of constituents who have been seriously injured on Government work, and they can not get relief, and I believe that the same rule ought to apply to all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from New York indulge me for a question? Is there no way whereby one injured on a public work here may recover except through the generosity of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is simply a gratuity of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May he not maintain an action for injury against the contractor or anyone in charge of the construction for negligence?

Mr. LITTAUER. It depends on whether it was done through the negligence of the contractor or by accident of some kind.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, of course, if the contractor was not negligent he would not be liable, neither would the Government. If the party injured was negligent, he would not be entitled to recover from the contractor or from the Government.

Mr. LITTAUER. I would like, just in this connection, to read what the superintendent of the Capitol said in connection with this accident:

Green, with other workmen, was engaged in handling iron beams. Part of the tackle used in hoisting slipped and a large beam swung around and caught him against the building wall, and Green suffered a compound fracture of the leg.

Similar compensation was paid to workmen in 1902 who had received injuries in connection with the reconstruction of the central portion of this Capitol.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was an accident that was incident to the service?

Mr. LITTAUER. It was incident to this man's service.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to line 18, page 43, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LITTAUER. I must object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. LITTAUER. I want to get on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRANGER. Will you give me a chance to offer it when we get through with the bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let the amendment be read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the proposed amendment be read for information of the committee.

Mr. LITTAUER. I desire to continue the reading of the bill regularly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to reproduce by photolithography or otherwise 4,855 copies, more or less, of the official plats of United States surveys constituting a part of the records of the office of the United States surveyor-general at San Francisco, Cal., which were destroyed by earthquake and fire on April 18, 1906, $14,565, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 17, after the word "six," insert "to remain available during the fiscal year 1907."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Edgar Smith from any tribal funds of the Cherokee Nation in the Treasury of the United States the sum of $5,000, in full for his services as attorney for said nation in the Supreme Court of the United States, in a certain cause entitled "In the matter of the enrollment of persons claiming rights in the Cherokee Nation by intermarriage v. United States: Cherokee Nation, intervenor," more particularly described as Nos. 419 to 422, inclusive, on the calendar of said court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to reserve the point of order upon that item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order upon the paragraph just read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to know upon whose recommendation this item was put in the bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. The item was inserted in the bill on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the amount approved by him?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Secretary says:

The contract was not submitted to the Department until after the services of the attorney had been rendered, some doubt having arisen concerning the legality of the last-named contract, since it was not executed until after the services of said attorney had been rendered; but in view of the fact that the services were fully rendered and performed by the attorney, in accordance with the understanding of the principal chief of said nation and the Department, I have the honor to recommend that the following item be inserted at this point.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reform School, Washington, D. C.: The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to allow in the accounts of S. W. Curriden, treasurer of the Reform School, District of Columbia, payments heretofore made by him in good faith to instructors in music and military exercises and for officers' uniforms on first appointment, in accordance with the regulations of the board of trustees.

Mr. LITTAUER. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, after line 17, insert:

"Judicial: For salaries of four deputy clerks in the Indian Territory for the fiscal year 1907, authorized by the Indian appropriation act approved June 21, 1906, at $1,200, $4,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, when I objected to returning to the paragraph under the Navy Department at the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. GRANGER] I was not aware that his attention had been diverted at the time that section was passed, and I now ask unanimous consent that we revert to page 43, in order that the gentleman from Rhode Island may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to recur to page 43, for the purpose of submitting an amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 43, after line 18, insert the following paragraph:

"To replace detention buildings at the training station, Newport, R. I., destroyed by fire on January 28, 1906, to be utilized in segregating recruits, including mess hall, mess and galley outfits, laundry, wash rooms, latrines, and other necessaries to make the same habitable and sanitary; in all, $94,321."

Mr. LITTAUER. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GRANGER. This is to replace very important buildings at the Naval Training Station at Newport which were destroyed there last winter. When the young men come there they are segregated for a period of twenty-one days, in order that if any contagious diseases develop they may be apart from the other men. This building, which was a very important one, was destroyed on the 28th of January, 1906. So that all the young men coming to the station—young men coming from workshops, and not men hardened by service at sea, boys 15 years of age and upward—must be placed in tents, and that is the practice at the present time. Of course during eight months in the year this is no hardship, but during the remaining four months it is not only a hardship, but a source of very great danger. I have here a letter from Admiral Converse, Chief of the Bureau, in which he states that last winter at the Newport Training Station, in addition to the usual diseases to be expected, such as mumps, scarlet fever, and so forth, there developed eighteen cases of cerebro-spinal meningitis, twelve cases of which resulted in death, and he goes on to state that had this building been there at that time the lives of these young men might probably have been saved and the number of other diseases lessened. So the lack of this building has resulted not only in sickness and the loss of life, but in a pecuniary loss to the Government, because these young men had been recruited at considerable expense to the Treasury. It also serves to give the training station a bad name, when they find that young men are subject to such hardships, and makes it more difficult to secure enlistments. This is a building which must be replaced at some time, and it seems to me only just that this House should make this appropriation now in order that these boys may not be placed in jeopardy again next winter. I trust the amendment will prevail.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I must renew my point of order. There is no authority of law for this.

Mr. GRANGER. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is a Government reservation, and that this proposition is to replace a building already authorized upon a Government reservation, and therefore it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is an entirely new building. The old building was destroyed.

The CHAIRMAN. The identical question was decided by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, when the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill was under consideration, on an item for the rebuilding of a public structure in one of the Pacific islands. The Chair then sustained the point of order to the provision. Following that precedent, the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company, of Adrian, Mich., for street letter boxes manufactured by that company, as subcontractors, and furnished to the Post-Office Department by the contractor, Eugene D. Scheble, of Toledo, Ohio, trading as the Michigan Steel Box Company, under his contract covering the period from July 1, 1901, to June 30, 1905, $18,227.40.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, this item relates to a contract entered into just prior to the time of the development of various conspiracies in the Post-Office Department. Payment was held up by the Postmaster-General until a much fuller investigation could be had into the contract and delivery, and the Postmaster-General now recommends payment for the goods delivered under the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that the assistant attorney-general for the Post-Office Department, in Document 676, recommended that $35,000 be withheld to ascertain whether the Government had any claims against this money until these changes are disposed of.

Mr. LITTAUER. There has been developed no claim against this company, and consequently the Postmaster-General recommends the payment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I understand the case against the original contractor has not been disposed of, and that until it is and it is ascertained whether the Government's claim arising out of the fraudulent transaction will amount to this sum Congress ought not to authorize the payment of that money to anybody else.

Mr. LITTAUER. Is the gentleman from New York aware that all the indebtedness of any name and nature to Scheble, who entered into the contract, has been waived?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the situation: The Government entered into a contract with the contractor to furnish certain boxes. He made a subcontract, and that contract provided that the subcontractor should not be paid anything until the contractor received his money from the Government. In 1903 the contractor was indicted for fraud, and $31,000 was held up until the Government could ascertain from the trial of these cases whether this claim against the contractor would amount to as much as that.

Mr. LITTAUER. Does the gentleman from New York think the Government had a right to hold up the claim as an offset?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it was very good administration.

Mr. LITTAUER. So do I.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If this man was obtaining money that he would not be entitled to, I think it was wise for the Government to stop the payment. The contractor and his affairs are in such shape that neither the Government nor the subcontractor can recover anything from him. Until it is ascertained that the Government will not be defrauded, I am opposed to releasing the money for the subcontractor.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman from New York is aware that the Government owes this sum to the contractor and the contractor owes it to the manufacturer. It is but proper that the Government should pay for the goods received, delivered, and used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York inform the Chair in what manner the contractor released his claim to the sum? Was it by formal release?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision authorizes the payment of that which is not now authorized by law, and that makes it legislation. If that was not the fact, there would be no necessity for this provision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, this is a case where the Government entered into a contract with the Michigan Steel Box Company in 1901 for furnishing letter boxes. It had entered into a similar contract four years before with the same party. Now, this Michigan Steel Box Company sublet the contract to the Adrian Brick and Tile Company. It was discovered during the late disturbance of the Post-Office Department that there was some fraud connected with the first contract. That case was gone into thoroughly by the legal department of this Government, and it was recommended to the Postmaster-General that there was no indictable fraud, or not evidence of fraud sufficient to warrant prosecution under it. The total amount of this item is $18,227.40, while the total amount due the original company, or claimed by it, is something over $31,000, and the Government never claimed it could offset more than a small amount, and the difference between the original contract price and the amount of this item would be more than enough for such offset, and this difference is still to be held by the Government.

This case arose as follows: In 1901 the contract for furnishing letter boxes to the Government was let to the said steel box company. This company sublet to the beneficiary of this item at about 60 per cent of the contract price. On account of the trouble with Scheble under the prior contract, the Post-Office Department refused to pay for the boxes which had been accepted by the Government and are now in its use and possession. The last contract is free from fraud, and especially has the Adrian Brick and Tile Company, after a thorough investigation, been exonerated from any fraud.

The Post-Office Department, being thoroughly furnished with all the facts, believes that this item should be paid and has so recommended. It has proposed through its legal department that Scheble should release the Government to the extent of the amount of this item and the brick and tile company were to receipt to Scheble for that amount. This has been done. I submit this waiver and receipt for the information of the chairman.

This is not a claim, but the brick and tile company have an assignment from Scheble and stand in the place of the contractor. This item arises under contract. The Post-Office Department has no money from which this amount can be paid. Congress should allow the item to stand in the bill, for it is just and equitable.

In consideration of the consent signed October 11, 1905, by Eugene D. Scheble, trading as the Michigan Steel Box Company, for the payment to the Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company, by an appropriation of Congress, of the sum of $18,227.40, the said the Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company does hereby release and discharge said Eugene D. Scheble from any and all indebtedness and claims of every nature and description.

This agreement and receipt is executed in duplicate for the purpose of filing one of said duplicate originals with the Post-Office Department, the same being at the request of the Assistant Attorney-General for said Department.

Dated and signed January 23, 1906.

THE ADRIAN BRICK AND TILE MACHINE COMPANY,
By E. C. SWORD, President.
E. N. SMITH, Secretary.

Executed in duplicate in presence of—
F. E. PRIDDY.
P. J. DUNN.

I, Eugene D. Scheble, of Toledo, Ohio, contracted with the Post-Office Department of the United States, under the name of the Michigan Steel

Box Company, to furnish certain street letter boxes for the use of the free-delivery service, from July 1, 1901, to June 30, 1905, inclusive.

I sublet the contract for the manufacturing and furnishing of said boxes to the Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company, of Adrian, Mich., with the stipulation that the said Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company should not be paid for the boxes manufactured and furnished until I had received pay for said boxes from the Post-Office Department.

I am still indebted to the Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company in the sum of $18,258.85 for boxes furnished the Post-Office Department under their contract with me and for which I have not been paid by the Post-Office Department.

In consideration of the release and discharge of my indebtedness to the said Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company I hereby consent that any appropriation made by Congress for the payment of said sum of $18,258.85 to said Adrian Brick and Tile Machine Company may be deducted from any sum that may be found to be due me under this or any other contract with said Post-Office Department.

Signed and sealed this 11th day of October, A. D. 1905.

EUGENE D. SCHEBLE.

E. R. SMITH.
A. BENNETT.

He himself, Mr. Robb, who investigated the alleged irregularities in the Post-Office Department, drew both the waiver from the Michigan Steel Box Company to the Government and the receipt from the brick and tile company to the Michigan Steel Box Company; so that this is simply a payment to the Adrian Brick and Tile Company its just dues, and I wish to repeat again that this Government is protected, even if it were to prosecute now under an indictment against Scheble, which the Attorney-General practically admits never will be done. The Government is protected absolutely, and we are simply asking that the Adrian Brick and Tile Company be paid for these boxes, which the Government has had since 1903. The accounts have been gone over by experts of the Department, and the report of the Postmaster-General himself is to the effect that it should be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. On the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that an appropriation to pay for boxes to a person who has a legal contract is one thing, but there is no law which authorizes the payment to a subcontractor except the law contained in this provision. This is a claim. It is not even a claim against the Government. It is a claim against a third party which this provision is authorizing the payment of.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the contractor has a valid claim against the Government. The effect of the document read by the gentleman from Michigan is an assignment in equity, if not in law, of that claim to the beneficiary of this provision, and therefore he holds now a valid, legal claim against the Government which may be paid by an appropriation in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I submit to the Chair that it is not in order in an appropriation bill to appropriate for legal claims against the Government. It is in order only to carry out provisions of existing law, but there is no rule that authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to pay claims that may have some foundation in law.

The CHAIRMAN. Appropriation bills may carry appropriations for the payment of claims against the Government authorized by law, and this is clearly authorized by law. It is under a contract authorized to be made, and the Chair is clear upon the question. The point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland mail transportation, star, fiscal year 1904, $399.50.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 2, page 57, insert the following new paragraph:

"To pay George W. Fleming, of Adrian, Mich., for services as letter-box inspector at Adrian, from March 29, 1902, to July 13, 1903, $1,073.33."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that provision. It is clearly unauthorized by law—services rendered without authority of law—a meritorious claim, but not fit to be submitted in connection with a general deficiency bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, I just briefly wish to state to the committee the object of this amendment. It is conceded by the Committee on Appropriations, it is recommended by the Postmaster-General that this provision is a proper one, at least an equitable one, and ought to be paid. The objection of the chairman of the committee is that this is a claim, and therefore it is not properly or can not properly be put in this bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. It is one of a series of a thousand like claims.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, this claim arose in this manner: The Post-Office Department employed Maj. George W. Fleming, of Adrian, Mich., to inspect letter boxes which were furnished to the Government under contract, as the records of the Post-Office show, to the effect that he was to receive 5 cents per box for inspecting them and for looking after the mailing of them. He performed that work, and it was accepted, and part of his bills, I understand, were audited by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department. The others were not, and they were returned with a statement that there was no money out of which they could be paid. It is due the Chair to state, however, that there was probably no authority on the part of the Postmaster-General to employ this man, as the work theretofore had been done by clerks who had been delegated from the Department to do the work. But the Government has had the service and it admits that it was absolutely necessary that it should be performed. It was done faithfully and by an honest and competent man. Now, we are asked to take this bill to the Committee on Claims, and thus let it sleep forever. It does not seem to me right. The chairman of this committee said, to begin with, that these claims which are justly due should be paid, but now, by rule of this House, justice is to be defeated. I submit that this may possibly be subject to the point of order, but I believe it should be the desire of this Congress to pay such bills as this one, which everybody who has ever had anything to do with it admits to be just. No member of the Committee on Appropriations will deny that it is a just and equitable claim. This man performed these services from 1902 to 1903, and he should be paid. I had hoped that the point of order would not be made against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Salaries and expenses of special agents, Department of Commerce and Labor," for the fiscal year 1905, 54 cents.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 57, after line 21, insert:

"ADDITIONAL AIDS TO NAVIGATION IN THE LIGHT-HOUSE ESTABLISHMENT.

"For a light and fog-signal station at Isle au Haut, Maine, $14,000.

"For a fog signal at Baker Island, Salem Harbor, Massachusetts, $10,000.

"Toward a light vessel to be placed near the entrance to Buzzards Bay, Massachusetts, to replace the one now known as the 'Hen and Chickens light-ship,' $50,000.

"For range lights at Bellevue Range, Delaware River, $40,000.

"Toward a light and fog-signal station at Miah Maul shoal, Delaware River, $40,000.

"Toward a light and fog-signal station on the Joe Flogger shoal, Delaware River, $40,000.

"Toward a light and fog-signal station at Ragged Point, Potomac River, $15,000.

"For a light keeper's dwelling at Sheboygan light station, Sheboygan, Wis., $6,000.

"For a light keeper's dwelling at Menominee Harbor, Michigan, $5,000.

"For a dwelling for the keepers of the light-house on Horseshoe reef, entrance to Buffalo Harbor, New York, $6,200.

"For a light keeper's dwelling at Tibbetts Point light station, New York, $4,000.

"Toward a light vessel to be placed off Martins reef, northwest end of Lake Huron, Michigan, $25,000.

"For range lights, Superior pierhead, Lake Superior, Wisconsin, $20,000.

"For a light station and range lights at Honolulu Harbor, Territory of Hawaii, $40,000.

"Toward a light and fog-signal station near Point Cabrillo, California, $25,000.

"For a light keeper's dwelling at Robinson Point, State of Washington, $5,000.

"For a fog signal at Ediz Hook light station, State of Washington, $10,000.

"Toward a new tender for inspection service in the Thirteenth light-house district, $35,000.

"For post lights on the Monongahela River, $5,000."

And the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the construction of the foregoing additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment, not to exceed the limits of cost respectively fixed in the act entitled "An act to authorize additional aids to navigation in the Light-House Establishment," approved June 20, 1906.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, these amendments carry appropriations amounting to $395,200. They are in order because of the passage and approval of the omnibus light-house bill, which covers many provisions, a part of which were included in the sundry civil bill, placed in the sundry civil bill on the Senate side. These amendments will take care of the balance of the projects authorized now by law, or rather such part of the provisions as is deemed necessary for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTAUER. Certainly.

Mr. RYAN. Does this amendment contain all of the provisions of the omnibus light-house bill omitted in the sundry civil bill?

Mr. LITTAUER. They complete the bill, and make provision for at least the beginning of construction under the authorizations in the omnibus bill for all projects, except those already carried in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RYAN. I hope it will be accepted; it is all right.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Legislative——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 58, after line 21, insert:
"To enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House borne on the annual and session rolls on the 1st day of June, 1906, including the Capitol police, the official reporters of the Senate and House, and W. A. Smith, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, for extra services during the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, a sum equal to one month's pay at the compensation then paid them by law, the same to be immediately available."

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I want that to come in between the word "legislative" and the words "House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furniture and materials for repairs of the same, $1,500.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after line 19, insert:
"For hire of horses, feed, repair of wagons and harness for the Doorkeeper's office, $100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To make the salary of the Chaplain of the House of Representatives $1,200 for the fiscal year 1907, $200.

Mr. SOUTHWICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after line 22, insert:
"To pay to the persons employed, respectively, as Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms in charge of pairs, clerk in charge of pairs, and the special chief page, designated as a 'Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms,' the difference between the compensation now paid them by law at the rate of $1,400 per annum and the rate of $1,600 per annum until the end of the present fiscal year or until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that. I also did it in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer some amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] offers amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, after line 22, insert:
"For annual clerks to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and Irrigation of Arid Lands, during the fiscal year 1907, at $2,000 each; in all, $4,000."
"For additional compensation of the superintendent of the House document room during the fiscal year 1907, $500."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against those amendments.

Mr. LITTAUER. The amendments just read are to carry out the purposes of the resolution adopted by this House this morning.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The resolutions got in as privileged, but it was merely to pay out of the contingent fund.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUDENSLAGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, and that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments 5 and 7, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked for a further conference with the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. BERRY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6463. An act waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Frank Holway Atkinson; and

S. 6522. An act to authorize the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to construct a railroad trestle across tide and shore lands in Controller Bay, in the Territory of Alaska.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution providing for the improvement of a certain portion of the Mississippi River; and

H. J. Res. 178. Joint resolution providing for the improvement of the harbor at South Haven, Mich.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6355) concerning licensed officers of vessels.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FULTON, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROHIBITING THE KILLING OF WILD BIRDS AND WILD ANIMALS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to submit a conference report on the bill H. R. 13193, and ask to have it printed under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LOUDENSLAGER). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the point of order made by my colleague from New York against the amendment just offered will bear, for the reason that the resolutions as passed this morning read as follows:

That during the remainder of the present Congress or until otherwise provided by law there shall be paid out of the contingent fund——

The CHAIRMAN. Is the appropriation in the proposed amendment limited to the authorization in the resolution? Is it any broader?

Mr. LITTAUER. It is for the fiscal year 1907, during the present Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. And is limited to the object contained in the present resolution?

Mr. LITTAUER. Limits it to the present resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The resolutions upon which the gentleman bases his argument state that certain sums shall be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise ordered by law. Now, if this provision is the law, and we authorize the payment out of the contingent fund, it is legislation. There is no law which authorizes these appropriations, and the resolution adopted by the House this morning provides that the amount shall be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided by law. In order to justify appropriations on this bill there must be a law which authorizes them.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the resolution adopted by the House providing for the payment of its employees is a law within the sense of the rule, and, therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay L. W. Busbey for services as clerk to the Committee on Rules, $1,000.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 61, after line 14, the following:
"For additional compensation to Harry West, as janitor and messenger to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, $280."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this item simply to make a statement to the effect that while I feel, being in charge of the bill, under obligations to make a point of order against any proposition not authorized by law, yet when it comes to the consideration of the salary of an attaché of the House, and especially a meritorious one like the one in question, I do not want to insist upon the point of order, but simply to call it to the attention of the House.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I will say, Mr. Chairman, this is offered in accordance with the unanimous request of the members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as a reward for very faithful service. I think that if there is any employee around this building, whether janitor, messenger, or clerk, who earns a salary of a thousand dollars, this man does. He stays here until half past 6 in the evening, and performs service not only as a janitor, but as a clerk, and in other lines; and if it were not for his efficient services another clerk would be required during the session.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the judgment rendered by the Court of Claims on May 18, 1905, in consolidated causes No. 23199, The Cherokee Nation v. The United States; No. 23214, The Eastern Cherokees v. The United States, and No. 23212, the Eastern and Emigrant Cherokees v. The United States, aggregating a principal sum of $1,134,248.23, as therein set forth, with interest upon the several items of judgment at 5 per cent from the several dates named therein to date of payment as provided in the decree, $1,134,248.23, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest, as required by said judgment.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, in line 7, strike out the words "as required by said judgment," and insert in lieu thereof the words "as authorized by law."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question in relation to this item. On page 66 it says that interest shall be paid on these judgments at the rate of 5 per cent from the several dates named therein to date of payment. Now, what I want to know is what those dates are.

Mr. LITTAUER. The date is from the 12th day of June, 1838, and the total amount of interest will be somewhere, as I said, between $3,750,000 and $4,000,000,

Mr. MILLER. Then I understand the gentleman that the judgment and interest in this case is over $5,000,000?

Mr. LITTAUER. About $5,000,000 is substantially correct.

Mr. MILLER. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what amount has been allowed in this case for attorney fees?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Court of Claims has allowed 15 per cent, and has permitted the various attorneys to enter into a stipulation among themselves, confirmed by the court, as to the percentages to be paid to the various representatives.

Mr. MILLER. Is it not true that there have been allowed in the neighborhood of a million dollars attorney fees?

Mr. LITTAUER. I should say $750,000 was nearer correct.

Mr. MILLER. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section. At the close of the section add this proviso.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, at the end of line 7, insert the following: "That there shall be no fees paid to attorneys out of this appropriation until the Court of Claims shall have readjusted and determined the amount due each attorney who rendered services under contracts with the Eastern Cherokees or their representatives, and that said court shall have full power to determine the respective interest of each claimant, and the said appropriation shall bear no interest after the passage of this act."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that provision would be subject to the point of order that it is new legislation not authorized by law. Our purpose here is simply to report to Congress the decree transmitted to us by the Court of Claims affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee will withhold his point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I will withhold it, in order that the gentleman may make a statement.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to say in reference to this particular item in this bill that in my judgment the legislation that has been heretofore enacted has been for the sole and express purpose of trying to secure very large fees in this particular case. I call the attention of the Chair to the law enacted in 1902, on July 1, providing that this case should be sent, or this class of cases should be sent, to the Court of Claims for judgment, and the language in the bill itself has been so carefully drawn that there can be no question but what it was drawn for the sole and express purpose of bringing together an agreement as to attorneys' fees. I read the language of that particular part of this bill:

The institution, prosecution, or defense, as the case may be, on the part of a tribe or any band of any suit shall be through attorneys employed in the manner prescribed under sections 2123 to 2126, both inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the tribe acting through its principal chief, in the employment of such attorneys and the band acting through its head, each recognized by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, I want to say that, so far as this particular law is concerned, these attorneys not one of them here that claim the adjudication of the court of $750,000 to be paid to them have ever rendered a single cent's worth of service in this particular matter. Never had anything to do with sending the case to the Court of Claims. It was sent to the Court of Claims on a report to Congress from the Secretary of the Interior, and not through any action whatever on the part of these men who are to receive large fees if this bill becomes law, and I can not see how it is possible for us to evade the passage of this bill, because it means that long ago, in 1850, the Senate of the United States provided by resolution that claims of this character should have 5 per cent interest paid on them, and under that law of 1850 the Supreme Court passed upon this case, and decided that they were entitled to 5 per cent interest.

And in place of receiving one million one hundred and thirty-four thousand and some odd dollars, they are now to receive about $5,000,000—$1,134,000 principal and $3,500,000 interest—and here are the attorneys, from every section of the Union, having an agreement with these Cherokee Indians, either the tribes or the bands, who have been doing various kinds of work, lobbying about this House and the other end of this building for the purpose of securing this 15 per cent of fees in this case, and they are getting a judgment here of $750,000; but the two men who will be benefited by this amendment have rendered more service in this case than all of the other attorneys combined. Yet they were unfortunate enough not to be in the Court of Claims under this particular bill at the time these cases were adjudged there, and hence their claims have not been allowed.

Upon the point of order, I wish to say that, in my judgment, this is not new legislation. I drew the amendment carefully, for the purpose of avoiding that very question, and it is for the purpose of having the Court of Claims simply readjust the attorney fees in this case, in order that all persons who had contracts under this law of 1902, under which this bill is being allowed, may have their claims readjusted, and that all persons may be permitted to receive the fees that they were entitled to under that law, and not under any new law that we are attempting to pass at this time. I say this is simply an act of justice to two men who have had more to do, so far as the legitimate work of this legislation is concerned, than any other two men connected with this case.

Mr. LITTAUER. Did I understand the gentleman to say "legitimate work?"

Mr. MILLER. The legitimate work of this case. I call attention to the fact that one of these men is Mr. Lynn, of Kansas, and I have offered this amendment because he is a citizen of my State. The other is a gentleman from the Indian Territory, Mr. Powell, and gentlemen who are acquainted with them know that they are men of sterling character and that they would not be here with a claim that was not just.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that a judgment of the United States Supreme Court can be set aside by an amendment such as the gentleman offers?

Mr. MILLER. No; we are not asking that the judgment of the Supreme Court be set aside, but we are simply asking that it may be stayed until this question is determined by the Court of Claims.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman recognize the fact that the staying of the judgment of the court will compel the payment of interest on $5,000,000? And does the gentlemn believe that if his amendment passes he will have served the best interests of this Government when he compels it to pay interest on $5,000,000 in order that one or two friends in whom he may be interested may have their cases adjudicated?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to say that I sought first to protect the Government of the United States, and hence as part of this amendment it is provided that the interest on this amount shall not be paid after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe that this House has the power to set aside a judgment of the United States Supreme Court?

Mr. MILLER. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman agree that the United States Supreme Court has said in its judgment that interest shall be paid upon this amount until the judgment is paid?

Mr. TAWNEY. At the rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. At the rate of 5 per cent. Does the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. MILLER. In my judgment this body has the power to legislate upon this class of claims exactly as it pleases, and, notwithstanding the judgment of the Supreme Court at this time, Congress, if it desired, could say that we would pay the principal and not any of the interest. There is no power on earth by which these people could compel the collection of any other amount.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that this House has the power to review a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. No; not to review a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. And now, Mr. Chairman, we are getting away from the point at issue.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman maintain that we have the power to set aside a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MILLER. I am not asking this body to set aside a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, but I am simply asking this House to stay the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States until all of the claims that are legitimate may be fairly adjusted before this appropriation is paid.

Mr. MADDEN. What the gentleman is asking is that the Government be compelled to pay $200,000 per annum interest on this $5,000,000 judgment until the case of his friend may be adjudicated in accordance with his wishes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will state that, in my judgment, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, these people are not entitled to 5 per cent interest on that money. If I had my way about it, not a single dollar of that interest would be paid by this House, and if I had the power to pass upon this question and settle it for myself, I would say to these attorneys who have never performed any services in the case, "You can not collect $750,000 for services to the Cherokee Indians which you never rendered." Two of the attorneys were former members of the body at the other end of the Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to suggest that this House can make an appropriation and pay the judgment upon any terms it sees proper to prescribe.

Mr. MILLER. There is no question but that the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment in the opinion of the Chair, is subject to a point of order. It contains a legislative provision providing that the judgment shall not bear interest from such a time. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 66, lines 2, 3, and 4, strike out the words "from the several dates named therein to dates of payment as provided in the decree."

Mr. LITTAUER. That simply perfects the paragraph in view of the amendment previously adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the same amendment I offered heretofore, except the last part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 7, page 66, insert a new paragraph, to read:
"There shall be no fees paid to attorneys out of this appropriation until the Court of Claims shall have readjusted and determined the amount due each attorney who rendered services on contract to the eastern Cherokees or their representatives, and said court shall have full power to determine the respective interests of each claimant."

Mr. LITTAUER. I make a point of order against that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to state to the gentleman that I do not think his amendment quite reaches the situation. These gentlemen that did the work that he mentioned were not attorneys. They were simply attorneys in fact. Unless he changes that amendment he will not accomplish what he wishes to. They were private citizens, and not attorneys, and for that reason the attorneys got together and fixed up things and left them out in the cold.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment is subject to a point of order under the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States. The court has determined the attorneys' fees and certified it to the House, and the effect of this amendment would be to refer the whole case back to the Court of Claims for consideration, which is clearly legislation, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, lines 1, 2, and 3, strike out the words "with interest upon the several items of judgment at 5 per cent from the several dates named therein to the date of payment, as provided in the decree."

Mr. LITTAUER. Those words have been stricken out of the last amendment adopted.

Mr. JAMES. Not the clause fixing the interest at 5 per cent.

Mr. LITTAUER. We did not strike out the provision fixing the interest at 5 per cent, for the interest on these claims was fixed by the court.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the gentleman is too late to reserve the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that the language the gentleman sought to strike out had already been stricken out by the last amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole. I did not know that that was not the fact, and so I did not reserve the point of order. If it is not the fact, I want to reserve a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that a portion of the language embraced in the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky had already been stricken out.

Mr. JAMES. My amendment was to strike out the language so as to not include the interest. Certainly a point of order would not lie against that. It would be in order to strike out "one million" and insert "two millions."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, the original treaty stipulation in connection with which this claim arises called for interest to be paid at 5 per cent per annum. Moreover, in the year 1846, under the eleventh article of the treaty, the Cherokees agreed to submit to the Senate of the United States as umpire the question whether interest should be allowed on the sums found due them. The Senate of the United States as umpire on September 5, 1850, found interest should be allowed in the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum should be allowed on the sums found due to the Eastern and Western Cherokees, respectively, from the 12th day of June, 1838, until paid.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, if these people can afford to pay lawyers $750,000 or a million dollars to prosecute this claim, does not the gentleman from New York think that they could let the matter go without charging the Government any interest?

Mr. LITTAUER. Oh, I suppose they could do anything in that line, but I take it for granted that they would like to get everything that is coming to them. This matter of the adjudication of the attorneys' fees was a matter settled by the courts and is out of our hands.

Mr. JAMES. Does that contract provide for 5 per cent?

Mr. LITTAUER. The contract did and the allowance was made by the court.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] that it is not a settled question, the amount of interest, from the time the matter was filed in the Treasury Department. There is one decision that interest can not go behind, and that was some time in 1905. We have that statement from the Auditor's office in the Treasury Department in the Appropriation Committee room, that it is uncertain when this interest began and how much of it there is due to these Indians. If the latter proposition is true, that interest does not begin to run on this claim until a certain date in 1905. There is a very small amount of interest, comparatively, due to these people.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman will recognize that the provision carried in the bill as amended simply calls for the payment of this judgment in accordance with law and as authorized by law, and the authorization of the law was based on the decree of the Court of Claims, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman understand, then, that the judgment of the United States Supreme Court would give them three and a half millions of interest?

Mr. LITTAUER. I believe that to be the fact.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I understand the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] is this, that the Supreme Court having acted in this case, it is the duty of Congress now to respect its decree.

Mr. LITTAUER. Unquestionably so.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MILLER], who a moment ago submitted the proposition that the Court of Claims be given power to review the decision of the Supreme Court fixing the attorneys' fees, that under the rule adopted this morning that is a very proper matter of consideration, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas that he now improve the proposition, which would do honor to him and to his State, and ask the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule permitting the Court of Claims, an inferior court, to review the decision of the Supreme Court on the question of these attorneys' fees. [Laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTAUER. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. How much is the entire amount at the present time, interest and judgment?

Mr. LITTAUER. The decree of the court is that the sum of $1,111,284.70, with interest thereon from June 12, 1838, to date of payment, less such counsel fees, etc., shall be paid to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him received and held for the uses and purposes detailed.

Mr. SULZER. That is all very clear to the gentleman, but it is not clear to me. I want to know exactly what the entire amount is, if the gentleman knows.

Mr. LITTAUER. The entire amount, as near as I can make it out, is somewhere between $3,700,000 and $4,000,000, probably nearer the former sum.

Mr. SULZER. How much of that will go to these lawyers, and how much will go to the Indians?

Mr. LITTAUER. The Court of Claims has decreed that the attorneys are entitled to 15 per cent, and has subdivided that 15 per cent, the law fixing this percentage. The judgment declared that the attorneys were entitled to 15 per cent, and the Court of Claims passed upon the subdivision among the attorneys.

Mr. SULZER. I think the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he can supply the House with a list of the attorneys and the respective amounts that are to be allowed under this decision of the Court of Claims?

Mr. TAWNEY. We have it in the committee room.

Mr. LITTAUER. We have such a list before us.

Mr. TAWNEY. We have the decree of the Court of Claims.

Mr. JAMES. I understand that; but I want to know what it is.

Mr. LITTAUER. I have in my hand here a statement of the awards to attorneys, as follows: To Vaile ———, 3 per cent less $3,600; to Belt, 1⅞ per cent less $2,000; to Scarrett & Cox, 2 per cent less $2,400; to James K. Jones, 1 per cent less $1,200; to M. C. Butler, 1½ per cent less $1,800; to William H. Robeson, 1½ per cent less $1,800; to R. L. Owen, 4½ per cent less $5,200; to Mrs. Belva Lockwood, $18,000.

Mr. JAMES. How is it they gave Mrs. Lockwood a stated amount of $18,000? Why did not they give the amounts in the other cases in a computed sum, so we could arrive at them as readily in the other cases as in hers?

Mr. TAWNEY. The amount awarded to Mrs. Belva Lockwood was the amount agreed upon by all the other attorneys.

Mr. LITTAUER. And deducted from their percentages.

Mr. MILLER. If the chairman of the committee will allow me, the Court of Claims in passing upon this claim awarded to Mrs. Belva Lockwood $3,000 a year for a period of six years.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask, for information, what amendment the gentleman from Kentucky has offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, it matters not what this House may do with respect to the payment of interest upon this judgment. The court has decreed that under the contract between the Eastern Cherokee Indians and the Government of the United States they are entitled to interest on this $1,111,000 until that amount is paid, the only question being as to when the amount will be paid; and the interest will thereby cease. Whether, when the judgment is paid over to the Secretary of the Interior, or whether when the amount is paid to the beneficiaries after the rolls have been made up. A few days ago I wired the Secretary of the Treasury and requested that he submit to the Committee on Appropriations a statement of the amount of interest due on this claim. Their actuaries commenced work on Friday, and on Monday they reported to the committee by letter that if they computed the interest one way the aggregate amount would be so much, and if they compute it another way the aggregate amount would be so much, and if you compute it on a basis that after the judgment has been obtained it can draw only 4 per cent interest, then the aggregate amount of interest will be so much. The committee therefore came to the conclusion that it was best, in preparing this provision, to follow the judgment of the Supreme Court, and appropriate for the principal, allowing the Department to determine what amount of interest should be paid.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman think, in following the Supreme Court in this case and declining to follow it in the Philippine case, you are showing undue preference to the Indian against the Filipino?

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Kentucky may draw his own conclusions, from the fact that we are following in this case the long-established practice of appropriating for the payment of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, or the amount the court has adjudged to be due to these Indians. It has no relation whatever to the ten or fifteen million dollars of claims that have not yet been sued against the Government of the United States. This is a judgment in this particular case, and like the judgment in the case in respect to the Philippine tariff duties to which the gentleman refers, collected in the Philippine Islands, this judgment will be paid as that judgment to which he refers should and undoubtedly will be paid.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit a suggestion, the claims are filed now, and you are simply trying to legislate them out of court.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg to differ with the gentleman as to the filing of claims, but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on this has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point that debate is exhausted.

Mr. TAWNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I have not consumed my time on the amendment which I offered. Mr. Chairman, I will say in conclusion that the court has decided that the Cherokee Indians are entitled to 5 per cent interest on the amount, namely, $1,111,000.

Until that amount is paid; that this is due them under the contract, which contract has been thus construed by the highest judicial tribunal in the land. We can not change it or modify it. We do not know exactly what the amount of interest will be. We appropriate for the payment of the principal and also appropriate for the payment of the interest, leaving to the Department to determine the legal question of the amount of interest due. I trust that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to strike out the words "with interest." For a great many years the Cherokees have been endeavoring to obtain a settlement with the United States of their claim growing out of the removal of the Cherokees to the western country under the treaty of 1838. As early as 1852 the question as to whether the Cherokees who had been removed were entitled to interest upon the amount expended in their removal from the Eastern States to the West—the present Indian Territory—was submitted to the Senate as arbitrator. The Senate decided in favor of the Indians, and for fifty years representatives of these Indians have been endeavoring to get this matter ratified by Congress, and finally, after all these years, during my term in the House the entire matter was left to the Court of Claims, and the right given to take the case to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court has decided that the Indians are entitled to interest upon this money from a certain date until it is paid. And the one way for Congress to get rid of it and to settle this claim, which is a just one, and which should be paid, is to pay it now. If it be not paid now, the interest will continue to run. And I hope, in the interest of justice and fair play, the decree of the court will be carried out.

Mr. JAMES. You are making a plea for the Indians and talking about what is just to them, but do you think it is just to the Government or to the Indians either to pay these lawyers $750,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know just how much the lawyers are to get, but it was necessary for these Indians to employ somebody.

Mr. JAMES. Do you not know that the amount is in the neighborhood of $750,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is about $600,000. I served six years upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, and this thing was continuously there. Of my own knowledge it has been pending in the courts six or seven years, and beyond that. The matter was presented as early as 1852. Now, somebody is entitled to be paid for services.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will permit me, I would say that during the Fifty-third Congress this claim was certified by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to an act passed by Congress authorizing an investigation and recommending payment, but it was not convenient for Congress at that time, because of deficient revenues, to pay it. So, in order to defer and delay its payment, it was referred to the Court of Claims. Had Congress paid it in 1894 or 1893 it would have saved this interest at 5 per cent, which is now a very large sum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The mere fact that attorneys are to receive compensation as a result of the fruits of these victories is not sufficient, in my judgment, to refuse to pay what the courts have found should be paid.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman say that the courts allow these fees?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that the Court of Claims allowed these fees under a contract. I may be mistaken, but if I recall correctly, under contracts approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JAMES. What Secretary of the Interior approved the contracts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know; but he has the power under a statute to approve contracts between attorneys and Indians, in order that the latter may have their rights presented to the court, and these contracts were approved. The attorneys were later sent to the Court of Claims. That court found how much of the money the different attorneys are entitled to, and I believe it is time we accepted the determination of the court and paid what has been found to be due.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the fact that if his motion to strike out a portion of this paragraph were to prevail it would not change the effect of the proposed legislation in any sense whatever, inasmuch as later along in the same sentence it is found that it is proposed to appropriate $1,134,248.23, "together with such additional sums as may be necessary to pay interest as required by said judgment."

Now, to strike out the 5 per cent that is provided for earlier in the paragraph would not affect the question a particle under the law. It is simply proposed in this legislation to pay the judgment, whatever it may be, of principal and interest.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will yield, I would suggest in reply to his contention that can all be remedied when we come to it by striking out the additional words.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman suggests that it may be further amended. That is equivalent to saying that the judgment that we are attempting to pay is not to be paid, and is no binding judgment. This Indian case went to the Court of Claims, and then to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court laid down the rule by which this judgment was rendered in the Court of Claims, precisely in accordance with a decree of that court, and we can not now change it by any legislation; it has passed beyond our interference; and there is no use of trying to lug in here any parallel between this question and the Philippine paragraph contained in this bill.

Mr. JAMES. Do you contend that we can dispose of an amendment before we reach it?

Mr. KEIFER. I am not contending anything, but you are simply proposing to do an entirely useless and needless thing and to tie up the whole matter when we undertake to dispose of that whole question. We might as well strike all out about the judgment as to undertake to strike out the essential part of it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is very plain, simply to deal with this as we provide in the language used here, that this shall be paid, and under the practice, if not by express provision of law, it is to be paid over to the Secretary of the Interior, and we are to pay interest on the judgment up to the date of such payment. Now, as I understand it, the date of such payment would be the time the money is paid over to the Secretary of the Interior, when he would become the disbursing officer for all these Indians, and from the date of that payment, whenever it is ready for disbursement, the Government will be relieved from any further interest.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. REEDER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, ever since I have known anything of these claims it appears that there are some circumstances connected with them which induces us to be extraordinarily willing to appropriate money to settle them.

Mr. WALDO. A parliamentary inquiry. Was the motion to close debate on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. To close debate on the paragraph, but amendments can be submitted.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use my time without interruption. It does seem that, for some reason or other, there have been exceptional advantages given to the Indians in this case. I know that we have a great many claims of our own constituents, and we do not expect to get anything but the principal for them. I believe we should adopt this amendment, because all the argument I have heard in support of paying this bill is that it is drawing 5 per cent interest. If we pay the principal, then interest will cease. I believe we ought to adopt this amendment, because we are treating these claimants with more respect, in my judgment, than we do our own constituents who have equally just claims.

Mr. TAWNEY. How can you pay the principal or the interest until the Interior Department has made up the rolls of those who are entitled to the benefit of the judgment?

Mr. REEDER. We can pass this amendment, and that will certainly put an end for the present to paying the interest; then as soon as the roll can be made up the principal can be paid. When the principal is paid interest surely will cease.

Mr. TAWNEY. What are you going to do with the decree of the Supreme Court?

Mr. REEDER. We have a great many claims for small amounts coming to us for various claims from our constituents, and they only ask the principal, and we can not secure that even. I sympathize with the claims of the Indians, but the claims of our constituents should have equal consideration.

Mr. LITTAUER. How is that on all fours with this?

Mr. REEDER. I am simply trying to stop the payment of near four million interest to these people who were interested to the amount of $750,000 or $780,000, which they expect to receive in attorneys' fees, which will amount to only about $200,000 if we cut out the interest, as we do in all other claims. I certainly think that this consideration should have weight with us in determining this question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be inserted at line 7, on page 66.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That out of the moneys by this act appropriated for the payment of the decree of the Court of Claims in favor of the Eastern Cherokees the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid 2½ per cent thereof to H. C. Linn and Samuel Powell in satisfaction of their claim for services rendered and expenses incurred by them on behalf of the said Eastern Cherokees, and deduct same pro rata from attorneys' fees allowed by the court.

Mr. LITTAUER. I make the point of order against this provision. It is not authorized by law, and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order now in any event, because there is one pending. When the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky shall have been disposed of, then it may be offered. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. LITTAUER. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman from New York will reserve the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. I must insist on the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is only a limitation on the fees already allowed.

Mr. LITTAUER. The question has already been argued here. This is contrary to the provisions of a decree of the Supreme Court, which has specifically passed on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clear that the amendment is out of order. Debate on the merits has been closed by action of the committee. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WALDO. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted. All in favor of the motion will say "aye," those opposed "no."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALDO) there were—ayes 17, noes 74.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE AUDITOR FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

For salaries, office of Commissary-General, $20.93.
For pay, and so forth, of the Army, $6,214.66.
For subsistence of the Army, $20.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add as a new paragraph, on page 69, after line 9, the following:
"For payment of damages, approved by War Department, to property in Winthrop, Mass., by reason of the firing of high power guns at forts Heath and Banks, Boston Harbor, in 1904 and 1905, $1,500."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order in order that the gentleman may make an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. KELIHER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment covers items that have been passed favorably upon by the War Department, forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury and by that official submitted to us that money be appropriated to cover the payment. Since their arrival in this body they have been passed like hot bricks from one committee to another, each most politely declining jurisdiction, a la Alphone and Gaston. Now, the Government stands pledged to the payment of these trivial claims, which are just and admitted to be so by those officials authorized and competent to judge.

In the beautiful seashore territory adjacent to the great city of Boston, in localities which the Almighty God seemed especially to have ordained should be reserved for residential purposes, where the people from the crowded and congested city might breathe, unpolluted, His invigorating air, the Government has deemed it necessary to erect its grim gray structures of defense. The most desirable spots in the most inviting sections of the town of Winthrop, strangely enough, pleased the strategical eyes of the Army engineers, and have been seized. Property valuations have lowered as a consequence and the town has suffered great losses in tax revenue as a result of forts and barracks taking the place of expensive residences and hotels.

In the target practice in which the heavy guns are fired, the territory for quite a distance around practically experiences the sensation of a modest earthquake when the skill of the gunner is tested. Windows are broken, ceilings cracked, crockery, glassware, vases, and other household fixtures and ornaments are ruined, chimneys demolished, and general damage done. The War Department receives an inventory of the damages complained of by the property owners, and a board of officers are designated to investigate the claims. This board returns its findings to the Secretary of War, who transmits a report of the amount covering same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who, in turn, submits it in his estimate to Congress. In the meantime those who have suffered the inconvenience and loss patiently await the payment of their claims. It would be much more honorable if the War Department bluntly told these claimants that they need hope for no settlement than to go through the hollow formality of fixing the amount of damages the United States has evidently no intention of paying. In everyday business life the individual who does not pay his just debts is dubbed a "dead beat," and his neighbors avoid him in all transactions, yet the United States Government, the richest at God's footstool, brazenly repudiates obligations it is bound in honor to meet, and yet expects those citizens who are the victims of its carelessness or cupidity to cheer for the national honor, which to them is a misnomer, and fight, if necessary, for a national integrity they do not recognize.

These debts are due; they are O. K.'ed by those vested with authority and qualified to pass judgment, and yet they remain unpaid. The War Department would speedily and gladly pay them if it had the money to do so, and now, while appropriating moneys to cover general deficiencies in the Government, what item in this bill is more deserving of recognition? Wonder is expressed at the growing hostility to the Army and Navy that becomes more manifest each day, and the query, "Why is it so?" is quite commonly heard. The reason can be found in part in the arrogant manner in which the officers of these branches of the service encroach upon the preserves of the civilian, giving little or no heed to the violence they do equity and fair play. I trust that this small item will not be bludgeoned to death by that awful instrument of destruction, the deadly "point of order," which violently terminates the existence of so many worthy, as well as unworthy, measures in this body. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For protecting public lands, timber, and so forth, $170.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17345. An act creating a United States district court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction; and

H. R. 15442. An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization of aliens throughout the United States.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The owner or owners, citizens or aliens, of any ship or vessel, foreign or domestic, and the owners of the cargoes laden thereon, and the owners of any property on board thereof, may, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to, sue the United States in any United States district court in which the parties so suing, or any of them, may reside, or in which the cause of action may arise, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such courts, for any damage, loss, or injury to such ship or vessel, or her owner or owners, or to the owners of any cargo laden thereon, or of any property on board thereof, arising from or attributable to the mismanagement of any vessel owned by the United States, or to the negligence or want of skill of those in charge thereof, by collision; and the said district court is hereby authorized to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such injury, loss, or damage, if any shall be found due, against the United States, in favor of such owners, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in the admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal that now exist by law in civil cases in which the United States are a party: Provided, however, That no such suit shall be brought more than six years after the collision shall have occurred.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. SULZER. I reserve a point of order against it, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the process or procedure by which suits may or can be brought, and service on or notice to the United States or its officers shall be made or given, may be regulated by courts of admiralty by rules or orders made therein; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to cause the United States attorney in each district to appear for and defend the United States in any such suit brought in his district.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. SULZER and Mr. FITZGERALD also made a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LITTAUER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert after line 16, page 4, the following:
"That the tariff duties, both import and export, imposed by the authorities of the United States or of the provisional military government thereof in the Philippine Islands prior to March 8, 1902, at all ports and places in said islands upon all goods, wares, and merchandise imported into said islands from the United States, or from foreign countries, or exported from said islands, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the collection of all such duties prior to March 8, 1902, is hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if the same had by prior act of Congress been specifically authorized and directed."

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 2, on page 5, add:
"Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall operate to divest any claimant who has filed his claim in the Court of Claims of any right possessed by him at this date."

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment, that it is new legislation and does not come within the terms of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order. It is germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the proposition before the committee is to prevent the success of claims which have been and will be made for the payment out of the Treasury of the United States of amounts aggregating something like $15,000,000 collected by the Philippine government as import and export duties in those islands under orders issued by President William McKinley, and amendments thereto, one of which, I think, was by President Roosevelt. These moneys which it is sought to compel the United States to pay out of the Treasury——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Concerning the statement of the gentleman that these claims will aggregate $15,000,000, I would like to ask where the gentleman gets his information? He ought to offer something to control the statement of the Attorney-General that the amount filed is about three and one-half millions.

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not want the gentleman to take up my time. I will insert, as a part of my remarks, a letter addressed by the Secretary of War to an honorable Member of this body, a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, of which I also am a member, in which the Secretary of War states that the duties collected on imports and exports amount to the sum of $15,000,000; claims already filed and shown in the brief which has been submitted in opposition to this amendment aggregate some three and a half million dollars.

Now, this money, none of it, not a dollar of it, was ever paid into the Treasury of the United States. It was all collected in the Philippines and expended there in maintaining the government and in public improvements and in protecting the property and business of those who now claim it. So the attempt is to take out of the Treasury, to make the United States liable for, this large sum of money, which never was in the Treasury. The allegation is that the President of the United States had no authority to impose these duties, and that the Supreme Court has so decided. The Supreme Court has decided that the President did not in strictness of law have the right to impose such obligations, to be effective after the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain, April 11, 1899; but Congress in 1902 attempted to ratify and make good the authority under which those duties were collected. It used this language in the act of 1902:

The action of the President of the United States heretofore taken by virtue of the authority vested in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, as set forth in his order of July 12, 1898, whereby a tariff of duties and taxes, as set forth by said order, was to be levied and collected at all ports and places in the Philippine Islands upon passing into the occupation and possession of the forces of the United States, together with the subsequent amendments of said order, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed, and the actions of the authorities of the government of the Philippine Islands, taken in accordance with the provisions of said order and subsequent amendments, are hereby approved.

We thought that ratified and confirmed and made legal these duties. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, in the Barnes case, has held that we did not use language broad enough to confirm and ratify the duties themselves. We thought we had done so, but the court which has the last guess, the court of ultimate conjecture, thinks that we did not think what we thought we thought, nor intend what we thought we intended, and therefore the court has held that we did not ratify those duties. The court put its first decision upon the ground that the order did not extend beyond the ratification of the treaty with Spain. A rehearing was granted, upon which it was shown that there had been a supplemental order and amendment, which was included in the act of 1902, and that the act of 1902 did ratify and confirm the duties.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. OLMSTED. I shall be very brief, I shall say to the gentleman.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I simply want to have an equal amount of time on this side. That is the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, as I was just showing when interrupted, the Supreme Court held that in passing the act of 1902 Congress had not, as it supposed it had, ratified these duties. Now it is urged, and we are led to believe by gentlemen opposed to this amendment, that the court held that Congress had not the authority to ratify and make legal the duties collected between July 12, 1898, and March 8, 1902, the period covered by this amendment. I call attention, first, to the fact that if the court had held that, it never would have granted a rehearing for the purpose of determining whether or not Congress had attempted to ratify. It would have been a senseless proceeding to occupy the time of the court, of the Government, and of private counsel to determine whether or not Congress had attempted to do something which the court held it had not the power to do at all. In the opinion of the court I find this language:

Even if Congress could deprive the plaintiffs of their vested rights in process of being asserted (Hamilton v. Dillin, 21 Wall., 73), still it is not to be presumed to do so on language which literally has a narrower sense.

That is from the majority opinion, after rehearing, in the cases of Lincoln and others against the United States, and Warner, Barnes & Co. against the United States.

In other words, the court itself in these very cases cited here in support of the proposition that Congress can not do what we are trying to do, quotes approvingly the twenty-first Wallace case, to which I shall refer in a moment, and which is authority in support of the power of Congress to ratify.

Mr. PARSONS. Is there not in the next paragraph cited an opinion which threw doubt on whether Congress had that power?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes; it cites an opinion, rather, in which the judge who wrote it used some language which might by possibility, though not by fair construction, be held as indicating that he had that opinion.

Mr. DALZELL. But that question was not before the court.

Mr. OLMSTED. The question was not before the court, and what the court did hold in that case of De Lima v. Bidwell was that it would not construe an act as having a retroactive effect unless the language plainly required it to do so. Now, in this brief which has been handed around here the opinion of the majority of the court in the Lincoln and Walter Barnes cases is published, but for some reason or other the opinion of the two justices, who, although they had concurred in the original ruling, dissented after the rehearing, is not printed. I call attention to that. It is written by Mr. Justice White, who says:

Construing the act of Congress which has been relied upon to establish the ratification—

That is the act of 1902—

by the light of the public documents referred to—

Meaning the supplements and amendments to the original order of President McKinley and referred to in the act of 1902—my mind sees no possible escape from the conclusion that that act was intended to and did ratify the collection of the charges complained of.

You see he differed from the majority of the court upon the question whether or not Congress had ratified them, and then he said this:

Having no doubt of the power of Congress to ratify, to my mind it clearly results that I erred in giving my assent to the previous judgment of reversal, and I therefore dissent from the opinion and conclusion of the court now announced.

Now, as I have pointed out, the court, in the majority opinion, referred to the case of Hamilton v. Dillin, 21 Wallace. The opinion written by Mr. Justice Bradley in that case was concurred in by the entire court. President Lincoln had issued an order in 1861 permitting trade with some of the Southern States during the civil war to be had under regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury had made a regulation that anybody wishing to buy cotton in certain States could do so by paying a license or penalty or tax, or whatever you call it, of 4 cents a pound. It was contended that neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury had any right to impose any such tax or license fee. Thereupon the Congress, three years later, in 1864, passed an act ratifying and confirming those charges.

Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the Supreme Court, said, on page 96:

We are also of the opinion that the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. L., 375), recognized and confirmed the regulations in question.

Then he quotes from the act and proceeds to say:

It will be observed that the law was prospective, relating to moneys thereafter to be received as well as to those already received. This was clearly an implied recognition and ratification of the regulations so far as any ratification on the part of Congress may have been necessary to their validity.

I call attention to another decision of the Supreme Court of the United States directly upon the point, found in Mattingly v. The District of Columbia.

Under the authority of the then District assembly in the District of Columbia improvements had been made and their payment provided for by assessments to the amount of one-third of their cost levied upon the property holders by the front-foot rule. It was held that those assessments were illegal. Congress passed an act several years afterwards ratifying and confirming them, whereupon the Supreme Court, as stated in the syllabus, held that—

Congress in exercising legislation over property and persons within the District of Columbia may, providing no intervening rights are thereby impaired, confirm the proceedings of an officer in the District or of a subordinate muncipality, or other authority therein, which without such confirmation would be void.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman read to the House the ruling as stated in this Mattingly case by Judge Cooley and approved by the Supreme Court, on page 600?

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman may read that. I do not want to take up so much time. It is all in support of my proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman, of course, does not want to mislead the House. Now, the Mattingly case was a case where the action that was ratified by Congress was not a void action in the first instance. The case at bar is a case where the action of the President was absolutely void. Judge Cooley makes the plain distinction.

Mr. OLMSTED. Judge Cooley did not decide that case. The Supreme Court decided it and ruled the precise point, as shown by the syllabus which I have read, that by confirmation Congress may make that valid which without such confirmation by Congress would be void. Language could not be planer. And, again, as appears also in the syllabus, the court held:

That such confirmation was as binding and as effectual as if authority had been originally conferred by law to direct the improvements and make the assessments.

Mr. PADGETT. Is it not an axiomatic principle of law that a void act is incapable of ratification, and can not be ratified if it is void?

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman may, if he desires, put his opinion against that of the Supreme Court which I have just read, which plainly declares that Congress may by this ratification make that valid which without such ratification would have been void.

Mr. PADGETT. I am not speaking of my own opinion. I am speaking of what the text writers in the law books recognize as a fundamental principle of law.

Mr. DALZELL. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference between the act of an individual which is subsequently ratified and an act of sovereignty which is subsequently ratified? There is all the difference in the world.

Mr. PADGETT. I say that an act that is void is incapable of ratification, because it is only a void act when ratified.

Mr. OLMSTED. I can not yield further for discussion on that point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like simply to call to the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] the case of Mattingly v. The District of Columbia, in the——

Mr. OLMSTED. That is the case from which I have just been reading.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is exactly in point, and exactly answers the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. OLMSTED. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the case of De Lima v. Bidwell, which is relied upon in opposition to this amendment, Mr. Justice Brown did say, in substance, that perhaps if the taxes had been paid under protest and the action commenced before the ratification act there might be some doubt. But these duties were not paid under protest, and I have called attention to several decisions expressly upon the point, showing that we have the power by ratification to make these duties valid.

We find when we come to refer to the list of claims that the most of them were not filed until after the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Lincoln and Warner Barnes cases. I will refer to this on the alleged question of contract or agreement.

Mr. PARSONS. I made the computation, and I think the gentleman is in error in that the number of claims are about a million dollars, and were not filed until after the first opinion was rendered by the Supreme Court, but two millions had been filed prior to that.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, there is a list of them here, and I will put them in my remarks if I get permission a little later.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What are these claims? How much do they amount to?

Mr. OLMSTED. The claims already filed amount to about three and a half millions, and the claims that might be made would amount to $15,000,000.

It has been claimed here—the gentleman from Massachusetts put in evidence a letter from the Assistant Attorney-General which he claimed showed that there was some kind of an agreement between the Department of Justice and those claimants with which it would be inequitable for us to interfere. But looking at that letter, which I hold in my hand, a copy which he offered, I find that it says this:

> After the Supreme Court had reversed the decision of the Court of Claims in the Warner Barnes case, arrangements had about been completed for the appointment of an auditor to report the facts to the court in the other cases, when the motion for a rehearing was made, whereupon, by mutual consent, all further proceedings were suspended pending the result of the motion.

Now, that is all there was about that. There was no agreement that any other case should abide by the decision of these cases. The Court of Claims would not have appointed an auditor in any event pending the motion for rehearing. Both sides simply quit and waited for the decision upon that motion. By so doing the claimants neither gained nor lost any rights nor changed their status in any way. That there was no such agreement as is claimed or, rather, insinuated, is made clear by the letter from the Attorney-General himself in his letter not yet twenty-four hours old:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 26, 1906.

MY DEAR JUDGE CRUMPACKER: Secretary Taft has brought to my attention the letter which he wrote to you, under date of June 25, concerning the proposed legislation ratifying the collection of duties in the Philippines between the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty and the imposition of a tariff by Congressional authority. I did not argue the case in the Supreme Court when it was originally submitted, but I did move for a rehearing, and applied for leave to argue the case orally, and then made an oral argument. I send you a copy of that argument, which you probably can not at this time read.

I agree with the statement of the case by the Secretary of War. I can not have the slightest doubt that it was the intention of Congress to have ratified the collection of those duties in the original ratifying act, but of course I submit cheerfully to the opinion of the majority of the court to the contrary. These claims are highly inequitable, and it seems to me that it is the duty of Congress to protect the Government against all claims of this class except those which have gone to judgment. In the absence of legislation, I should fear the result of any case brought to recover duties collected during this period on goods coming from all foreign countries, for it would be difficult within the reasoning of the court to contend that the validity of the order imposing the duties did not cease with the war with Spain. Of course, goods coming from Spain during this period are entitled by the treaty to come in upon an equality with goods coming from the United States.

There was no agreement made by this Department, with which I am aware, that the cases in the Supreme Court should be regarded as conclusive of any other cases.

I send this hasty note to you at the request of Secretary Taft.

Sincerely, yours,

W. H. MOODY.

Hon. EDGAR D. CRUMPACKER,
Committee on Insular Affairs, House of Representatives.

I have had a conversation with the Attorney-General over the telephone, in which he reiterated that statement and authorized me to say that there was no contract or agreement which should in any way operate to embarrass or affect us in passing this amendment ratifying these duties.

The letter of the Secretary of War referred to and indorsed by the Attorney-General is the one to which I have already referred, and which I am authorized by Secretary Taft, and also by the recipient of the letter, to make public. It contains the following complete statement of the case:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 25, 1906.

MY DEAR JUDGE CRUMPACKER: I am very anxious to secure the passage of an act at this session of Congress which shall ratify and legalize the collection of duties, export and import, collected in the Philippine Islands by the provisional military government established by President McKinley and continued under President Roosevelt prior to March 8, 1902, when Congress passed its first Philippine tariff act.

The duties collected between April 11, 1899, the date of the ratification of the treaty of cession, and March 8, 1902, must have aggregated at least $15,000,000 gold. This sum was expended in furnishing a government for Manila and the islands and in public improvements. It was paid chiefly by large importers and exporters who sold their goods at profitable prices including the duties paid, and who enjoyed the benefit and protection of the government which the taxes were expended to support. The money paid as duties never came into the Treasury of the United States at all.

After the insular decisions, in which it was held that the Philippine Islands were territory belonging to the United States, in which the President as Commander in Chief has no power to impose duties on merchandise imported from the United States, Congress passed a law approved July 1, 1902, in the second section of which it was supposed by the War Department that Congress had ratified the duties collected in the islands prior to March 8, 1902. Section 2 is as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the action of the President of the United States heretofore taken by virtue of the authority vested in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, as set forth in his order of July 12, 1898, whereby a tariff of duties and taxes as set forth by said order was to be levied and collected at all ports and places in the Philippine Islands upon passing into the occupation and possession of the forces of the United States, together with the subsequent amendments of said order, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed, and the actions of the authorities of the government of the Philippine Islands, taken in accordance with the provisions of said order and subsequent amendments, are hereby approved: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to amend or repeal an act entited 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' approved March 8, 1902."

Before the passage of this act of July 1, 1902, suits had been brought by certain importers against the United States in the circuit court of the United States and in the Court of Claims to recover back duties paid in the Philippines after April, 1899, and prior to March 8, 1902. The United States defended on many grounds, the main one being that there was a state of war due to the insurrection between the two dates which justified the imposition of such taxes as a military exaction, and another being that even if the taxes were illegal when imposed and collected, they were made legal by the ratification of them by Congress in section 2 of the act of July 1, 1902, above quoted.

The Court of Claims upheld the first defense of the United States above stated, to wit, that there was, when the taxes were levied and collected, a state of actual war, in which they were justified as a military exaction, and so did not find it necessary to pass on the question of ratification. The two cases were appealed to the Supreme Court by the claimants, and that court decided that there was no such state of war in the Philippines as to justify the holding of the Court of Claims, and further held that section 2 of the act of July 1, 1902, did not in fact ratify and confirm the duties collected between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, because by its terms it only ratified duties collected in pursuance of the Executive order of President McKinley of July 12, 1898, and subsequent amendments; that the order of July 12, 1898, was a war order, intended to be effective only during the war with Spain, and duties collected after the treaty of peace could not be said to be collected in pursuance of that order, and were, therefore, not within the ratification of the section relied upon.

The result of the decision of the Supreme Court was to increase greatly the number of claims filed in the Court of Claims, so that the aggregate amount claimed amounts to three and one-half millions gold.

A petition for rehearing was filed in the Supreme Court by the Attorney-General urging that an error had been made by the court in failing to note that while the original order of July 12, 1898, might have been limited to the period before the treaty of peace, the section included not only duties collected in pursuance of the original order of July 12, 1898, but also those collected in pursuance of amendments to the order, and that one or more of the amendments were made after the treaty of peace. The petition for rehearing was granted for argument solely on the point whether Congress had ratified the collection of the duties collected and now sought to be recovered. On the rehearing, the court, which had been unanimous in the first hearing divided, a majority affirming their previous decision, while Mr. Justice White and Mr. Justice McKenna dissented, expressing the opinion that Congress had ratified the collection of the taxes sought to be refunded and that, as there was no doubt about the power of Congress to ratify, the judgment should be against the claimants. The duties sought to be recovered in these suits are only those imposed on goods coming into the Philippines from the United States; but if the collection of duties on goods coming from the United States was illegal, it is difficult to see how duties imposed by the same authority on goods coming from foreign countries were not equally unauthorized and illegal and why export duties were not also beyond the power of the Philippine authorities to collect.

In other words, there is very grave danger that under the decision of the Supreme Court and its construction of section 2 of the act of July 1, 1902, claims may be successfully presented and judgment obtained for the whole fifteen millions or more collected and expended in governing the Philippines for two years, so that this burden shall be saddled on the United States, to reimburse the persons who have already reimbursed themselves for the duties they paid in the prices at which they sold the imported or exported merchandise, and who have enjoyed the two years of protection that the Government which these duties supported afforded them. There is, therefore, not the slightest real equity existing in favor of these claimants, and it is right and just that if Congress can by curative legislation in any way defeat these claims, it should do so.

You, who were cognizant of the purpose of the act of July 1, 1902, know that it was the intention of the second section of that act to confirm and legalize the collection of these very duties, but the language selected must have been unfortunate. The court say in its opinion, in effect, that Congress might have used language specifically ratifying these duties, and because it did not do so and used doubtful language, it would construe the section strictly and hold that Congress did not thereby intend to ratify these duties. It seems to me, therefore, that Congress may properly now ratify specifically these duties and come up to the measure set by the court.

It is argued that this proposed act is beyond the power of Congress because it defeats vested rights. If that be true, why did the court consider the question of ratification at all? Why did it give a rehearing on the question whether Congress had in fact ratified the collection of the taxes? Why did it not invite a hearing on the question whether Congress could ratify, and if there were no power to ratify, base its decision on that conclusive ground? The truth is that the Supreme Court in the case of Hamilton v. Dillon (21 Wall., 73), has expressly upheld the power of Congress to ratify taxes collected without authority. The claimants have all along contended that the case of De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 1) was an authority for the proposition that retroactive legislation of this character, especially after suit brought, was unconstitutional. There was in that case an obiter dictum by Justice Brown, that after suit brought, it would seem that right to recover duties illegally paid could not be divested by curative or retroactive legislation.

The decision in De Lima v. Bidwell, however, was put on a different ground. It is full of significance that if Justice Brown's dictum had been recognized as law by the court it would have furnished a conclusive reason for deciding the cases just decided against the United States without any regard to the intention of Congress to ratify the collection of the duties involved, because, as already stated, the act of July 1, 1902, relied on for ratification, was passed after the claims before the court had been filed in the Court of Claims; and yet the court in these cases, not only in its original decision, but also in its order granting a rehearing, and also in its second decision, made the question whether Congress had intended by section 2 of the act of July 1, 1902, to ratify the collection of these duties, the turning point of the case. De Lima v. Bidwell, supra, is cited by the Supreme Court in the decisions in the present cases not for the point relied on by the claimants, which, as I have said, would have been conclusive and foreclosed all necessity for considering the question of ratification, but merely to the point that the court will strictly construe retroactive legislation of this character.

The mere fact of bringing a suit does not change the nature of a right. If vested before suit, it is vested afterwards. If capable of being lawfully divested before suit, it may be lawfully divested after suit brought. A judgment, of course, changes the nature of a right so that it can not be divested, but until judgment, verification may take effect. The proper limit to ratification is this, that the depository of authority may ratify any act done by one assuming authority without warrant, and validate the act as against a third party if meantime, i. e., between the act and the ratification, the third party affected has not changed his situation to his injury so as to make the validation of the act inequitable. How have the claimants here changed their situation to their injury in any way by the mere filing of the suits in the Court of Claims? As already said, this proposed act could not invalidate judgments already entered, and does not do so, but it may affect, and ought to affect, pending causes, and it will affect, and ought to affect, the myriad of claims that will be filed hereafter in order to enable the importers and exporters of the islands, most of them foreigners, to eat their cake and have it, too—to collect the duties from the consumers in the prices charged on the one hand, and to collect the duties again from the United States on the other, and also to enjoy the protection of the Government supported by these duties.

If this proposed act is invalid because it attempts to defeat vested rights, a view which the course of the court in these cases does not sustain, then the claimants will not be affected injuriously by it, for it would not prevent the court from giving judgment for the claimants on any of these claims. On the other hand, if the proposed act is within the power of Congress, there is not the slightest doubt of its duty to protect the Government against such inequitable claims by such curative legislation.

I inclose copies of the two opinions of the Supreme Court and the petition of the Attorney-General for rehearing.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

Hon. EDGAR D. CRUMPACKER,
Committee on Insular Affairs, House of Representatives.

Now, one word further. I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts and of my friend from New York, who interrupted. If they will look at the list of these claims they will find that almost all of them were filed after the decision of the Supreme Court, which was filed April 3, 1905. Beginning with April 11, 1905, we find Stahl & Rumcker, a German firm; Leonora T. Aylade Zobel, a Filipino; and then Fabricade Tabacos La Insular and Alfredo Chicote, and then the first American claim after that date is that of the Standard Oil Company, of New York, for $173,221.44, filed April 12, 1905. That is all on page 1, and then a whole list of German and other claimants filling three pages more of hard names, with an occasional American by way of relief.

Mr. PARSONS. That was filed after April 3?

Mr. OLMSTED. That was filed April 11, 1905; which is after April 3.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Are the claims for duties they should have collected?

Mr. OLMSTED. These claims are made mostly by residents of foreign nations upon the Treasury of the United States for money which, as I explained, never went into the United States Treasury, but which they paid for the privilege of doing business in the Philippine Islands; paid without protest; paid supposing, as we all supposed, that the duties were legally due. We now propose to make them legal. The duties thus paid were all expended in the Philippines. It seems to me that any gentleman can cheerfully support this amendment who is more in favor of protecting the Treasury of the United States than he is in favor of protecting the interest of these foreign and a few American claimants, who have already reimbursed themselves by adding these duties to the prices charged for their goods. There is no equity in their claims. There is no question of power. The question is whether Congress shall or shall not stand between the people's Treasury and this stupendous raid upon its contents. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe that the personality of the claimant makes any difference as to what shall be done?

Mr. OLMSTED. It would not make a particle of difference with me, but if I were defending these claims I should expect the gentleman from New York to make a difference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman emphasized particularly the fact that the Standard Oil Company has a claim of $173,000, while the total amount involved is over $15,000,000.

Mr. OLMSTED. There are a few other Americans that have some claims, but it does not make any difference whether they are Americans or foreigners.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was there any special reason why the gentleman emphasized that particular fact?

Mr. OLMSTED. I did not emphasize that. I can not read the whole list. I will insert all the names in the RECORD with my remarks, if permission is given, without italics of emphasis on one of them. What we propose is to protect the Treasury of the United States against all these claimants, no matter what their nationality may be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So that the name makes no difference?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not a particle.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15442) to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. MCLAURIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 17345) creating a United States district court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SPOONER, Mr. KEAN, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10610) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] is recognized for twenty-three minutes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the first proposition in support of this legislation is that there was no agreement between the Attorney-General's Department and these claimants which Congress ought to respect. In answer to the assertion that there was no agreement, I call attention again to the letter of the Hon. L. A. Pradt, of counsel for the United States, to Henry M. Ward, of counsel for the claimants, in which he says:

> After the Supreme Court had reversed the decision of the Court of Claims in the Warner case—

Which was one of the test cases, I may explain—> arrangements had been about completed for the appointment of an auditor to report the facts to the court—,

That is, the Supreme Court—> in the other cases when the motion for a rehearing was made, whereupon, by mutual consent, all further proceedings were suspended pending the result of the motion.

"By mutual consent." Whose consent? Not the voluntary act of the claimants, because that would have no mutuality. There must be two parties in any arrangement which is mutual, and the other party unquestionably was the office of the Attorney-General. Now, what would have been the course of proceeding if it had not been for this arrangement which was adopted by "mutual consent?" The facts would have been reported to the Supreme Court, and if the rehearing had not been granted, the decision of Warner & Barnes would have stood; then judgment would have been entered on the cases upon which the facts had been reported, namely, upon these cases then pending in the Court of Claims.

Can there be any other conclusion upon that point? If there is any doubt remaining in the minds of any Member, let me read the declaration of the Attorney-General, made in a solemn document which he submitted to the Supreme Court. This declaration was made on the 20th and 26th of May of this year. He submitted a statement of the number and amount of the claims pending in the Court of Claims, and common sense will teach us that he could have submitted them for one purpose, and one purpose only. That purpose was to call to the attention of the Supreme Court the amount of money which the United States would be liable for if the decision in the test cases were upheld. It was said in that brief:

We submit to the court the following statement of claims filed which would come under the decision of the court.

What decision? The decision in the two test cases; that and nothing else. What claims filed? The claims pending in the Court of Claims. What else could be meant? In the statement of May 26, in order to correct the total of claims which were filed in the first brief—and the first brief shows there was seven million and odd dollars liability on the United States and the second brief about three and a half million—he uses this language:

It is unnecessary to say that we had no intention or desire to exaggerate the consequences of the decision, and it is manifest that allowing for the error made—the sum of money at stake is large enough to justify our previous reference to the money importance of the issue.

Now, mark this language—

What money importance? Money importance of the issue involved in the decision of the cases then pending in the Court of Claims, which would be decided in accordance with the principles of Warner & Barnes. Will any gentleman seek to crawl from under that state of facts and tell this House, on his conscience, that there was no agreement between the Attorney-General's office and these claimants?

Now, Mr. Chairman, something has been said of the amount of these claims. The gentlemen say they amount to $15,000,000. When I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon what authority he stated that $15,000,000 would have to be paid, he said upon the authority of the Secretary of War. But the Attorney-General, on the 26th of May of this year—a little over a month ago—stated that only about three and a half million of claims had been filed. Perhaps some more will be filed, but I am convinced that not more than five million of claims can by any possibility be filed.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Attorney-General in his statement referred only to the claims which had been filed at that time. Is it not a fact that if we do not pass this law anybody else who paid any duty would have a right to make a claim as well as those who have filed claims?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; but what I wish to point out to the gentleman is that even in that case there is no authority for the statement that $15,000,000 would be paid out, and the Secretary of War has failed to furnish this House with the evidence upon which the assertion is based.

Mr. OLMSTED. He says that fifteen millions of duties and imports were collected.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But the gentleman fails to remember, and while I do not say that the Secretary of War neglected to inform him, at all events he does not seem to be informed on this point, namely, that no money will have to be paid out that was collected on imports from foreign countries. That has been decided by the Supreme Court. Neither will any money have to be paid out that was collected on duties between the promulgation of the order and the time of the treaty of peace.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is precisely the point on which there is a difference of opinion between the gentleman and the Attorney-General of the United States as well as the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that the Supreme Court's decision expressly settles that in so many words.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] is entirely right. The principles of the Supreme Court's decision authorize the statement which I make, namely, that the United States did have authority to levy duties upon goods coming from foreign countries.

So much for the question of the amount covered by the decision. I do not think that is an important question. If the principle for which we contend here to-day is a just one, it matters not whether one million is to be paid out or one hundred millions.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. I wish the gentleman would inform the House whether or not in his judgment these importers who paid out this tax added that tax or tariff to the price of the article which they sold to the consumer?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I have no knowledge upon that point, and I think the question is wholly immaterial. I know that it is asserted, upon the other side, that there is no equity in the cause of these importers because they added the amount of the duties to the amount which the consumers would otherwise pay for the articles. In other words, that they had collected the money in the increased prices charged to the consumers. But let me point this out to the gentleman, that they paid this money because they had to, and then, as prudent business men, taking into consideration the possibility of an adverse decision by the Supreme Court, they collected what they could in the market under circumstances of free competition. If they had waited until the Supreme Court had spoken and the Supreme Court had decided against them, they having sold their goods at the low price, would have had no opportunity to recoup.

The only thing that was open to them as business men of common prudence was to fix the price high enough to make them whole in the event of the Supreme Court's decision being against them. And I would like to have some gentleman answer me this question: Assuming for the sake of argument that these men did collect this extra money from consumers, by what right does the United States claim it now? Does the United States Government come into equity with clean hands? If the money collected by these people is regarded as spoils, by what right is the United States entitled to the spoils any more than these claimants?

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. I will say in reply to that, by a right much greater than these monopolies will have to add this tax and make the consumer pay it to them in the sale of the article and then come and ram their hands into the Public Treasury and take it out again.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman's argument, if carried out, is this: That if duties are collected unlawfully upon my goods to-morrow at the port of New York, Congress may, by subsequent act, authorize that illegal action and compel me to lose the money which was taken from me without warrant of law. If we follow his logic, then that affects every case in which excessive duties have been collected which have subsequently been declared by a board of appraisers or by the court to have been unlawfully collected and afterwards paid back.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is not the fact about this: That the amount collected was turned into the Philippine treasury and has been paid out and used by the Philippine government, and that the question now is whether these importers, who have already got back, in the increased prices for which they sold, all they paid, shall have in addition these duties, or whether the United States shall be saved harmless from loss, even at the expense of not giving these people double the amount of the duty? [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Oh, I do not wonder that the other side applauds that sentiment, but I do not feel it in my heart to applaud it.

Mr. JAMES. That was also on this side.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Let me say that the money did not find its way into the Treasury of the United States. It was expended upon the government of the Philippine Islands, but expended under the authority of the United States and under its direction, and the United States was responsible for that expenditure. But that does not relieve the United States of its obligation to pay it back under the decision of the Supreme Court that it was collected unlawfully.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Oh, it seems to me I must be allowed to proceed.

Mr. OLMSTED. Just a single question.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Not now, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The question in this case is a simple one, and that is, whether the order under which these duties were collected was a valid order, and whether, if it was not a valid order, it can be ratified and legalized by Congress. Now, every decision which has been cited by the gentleman is not to the point at all, because the only point involved in this case is whether Congress has power to ratify an unconstitutional act of the President of the United States. Now, then, an unconstitutional act is a void act, and there never was power in a citizen or a sovereign to ratify an act which was void in the beginning. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in his extremity sought to draw a distinction——

Mr. JAMES rose.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I must decline to yield. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] sought to draw a distinction between the power of ratification of a citizen and of a sovereign. I assert there is no distinction between the power of a citizen and of the sovereign to ratify a previous act; that the whole power of ratification goes to the whole length of the previous authority. It is neither more nor less. The citizen can ratify that which might have been authorized before; the sovereign can ratify that which might have been authorized before. The decision which the gentleman mentions—Hamilton v. Dillin—was put upon the express ground that the money in that case was paid voluntarily and that the plaintiff therefore had no standing in court. That is entirely different from this case, where the money was paid under duress. Furthermore, in Hamilton v. Dillin the court said expressly that the order of President Lincoln imposing the charge of 4 cents a pound on cotton shipped from insurrection territory to a loyal territory was a valid order of the President under his power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and all that Congress did afterwards was not what it is attempting to do in this case—to ratify an unconstitutional and void act of the President—but to ratify a constitutional and valid act of President Lincoln in that case.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman said this money was paid under duress. Is there any basis for that statement?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. It was paid under duress, because——

Mr. DALZELL. Did anybody ever object to the payment? Is there an iota of proof that any man ever paid a dollar under protest? It was paid in the ordinary course of business, just as he paid customs duties before and as he paid customs duties since. It was a voluntary payment.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I assert that the gentleman is wrong in his conclusion, for whenever the United States Government at any port in the Philippine Islands laid its hand upon property which was entitled to free entry under the existing law and compelled the importer to pay before he could remove that property and put it in the channels of commerce, that was a payment under duress, and not a voluntary payment. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, then, there is a power to ratify a voidable act, but there is no power to ratify a void act. To use a homely illustration, a physician may be called in to cure a sick man, but a physician can not bring back to life a dead man. So the Congress may exercise the power of ratification where Congress in the first place could confer power to do the act in question, but Congress can not subsequently ratify that which it had no authority in the first instance to authorize anyone to do, and Congress in this case, although it might have framed a tariff for the collection of those duties, did not attempt to so frame a tariff. It sought to ratify an order of the President under which duties were collected, and the President had no power to frame a tariff, because his only power was the war power, and the Supreme Court has held that a state of war did not exist which justified the exercise of the war power.

I do not believe that this House can be misled by specious and sophistical arguments away from this point, viz, that the Supreme Court has twice decided this question and twice confirmed the title of these claimants to money which the United States unlawfully exacted. The question is whether you shall nullify the decision of the Supreme Court, repudiate the just obligation of the United States to restore to these citizens their property which was taken from them without due process of law and without just compensation. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield. Has it not always been Democratic doctrine that the consumer pays the tax, and, if that doctrine be true, how can you assert upon this floor that the importer, who has already collected that tax from the consumer, is entitled again to get it back from the Public Treasury? And is it not true that the consumer, if anyone, is the one entitled to this money back, and not the importer? [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman has stated what is undoubtedly true and what is Democratic doctrine, that the consumer has paid the tax. We are not denying that if these gentlemen pitched their scale of prices high enough to include the tax that the consumer in this case paid it. But I want to remind the gentleman of this fact, that it has always been Democratic doctrine also to respect the decisions of the courts and to maintain those guaranties for the safety of property which are the bulwarks of our civilization. [Applause.]

And in this case the money which has been collected has been collected without due process of law, and all that is sought here is to defeat the operation of that salutary principle in the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Now, if the gentleman, in his desire to confer some pretended favor upon these consumers, will defeat the law, let him do so. The action of Congress will not put back into the pocket of any consumer in this case, who has paid an excessive price, one penny which has been exacted from him. But the action of Congress may keep in the pockets of the United States Government the money which the highest court of this land has twice said was taken unlawfully and which under that decision the claimants are entitled to recover.

Mr. JAMES. Have you ever heard of the Democratic party advocating the decision of any court that held that a monopoly which once had placed the price it paid the Government upon the article and had gotten it back from the people, by adding the tariff to price of the article to the consumer, might go, by reason of the action of the court, and get money again which had already been paid into their pockets by the people? If that is Democracy, my friend, Massachusetts Democracy does not square with Kentucky Democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If Kentucky Democracy will sanction the taking of the property of the citizen without due process of law, I thank God I stand for Massachusetts Democracy and not Kentucky Democracy. [Applause.] Now, then, let me say in further answer to the gentleman's argument, suppose that taxes were unlawfully assessed upon property, and because of that assessment, under an unconstitutional law, the owner of the property advanced the rent to his tenants and collected that rent, and two years later the owner of that property, in bringing a suit, had his right confirmed to recover the taxes which were unlawfully collected.

Having got the taxes back under the mandate of the highest court, would the gentleman from Kentucky then say that it would be the duty of that landlord to hunt around for the tenants who had paid this excess and restore it to them? Is there any virtue in the assertion of a right any longer in the United States? These importers as business men acted as ordinarily prudent business men would. They fixed their prices perhaps high enough to cover the cost and the taxes which had been collected from them. And they had a right to take into consideration the fact that the Supreme Court might decide against them. Now it so happens that the Supreme Court has decided in their favor. Will the gentleman tell me that, having asserted a constitutional right in the courts of his country, after that constitutional right had been vindicated by the highest tribunal of the land, the Congress should then come in and deprive the litigant of the legitimate fruits of his victory?

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to suggest to him this: That the situation as it is here presented was not presented to the Supreme Court. Suppose this state of case had been presented to the Supreme Court: That the Standard Oil Company had gone to the Supreme Court and said, "We paid a tariff tax in the Philippine Islands, we added the price of that tax to our oil. We went into the humble cabins of those islands and made the users of the oil pay us that tariff tax back by adding it to the price of the oil. Now, we want the Supreme Court to hold that we can go and put our hands into the Public Treasury and get that money back again." Would any court hold that to be good doctrine?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I have just one anxiety about this matter, and that is that the House shall thoroughly understand the question before us. There is no question before us except that of a threatened tremendous raid on the Federal Treasury; and in my judgment the House will be false in its duty to the taxpayers if it does not put this legislation between these marauders and the public Treasury.

Now, how does this question arise? It is useless to go into a legal discussion. How does this question arise? In this way: During the war with Spain, in 1898, after we became possessed of the Philippine Islands, Mr. McKinley, as President, issued an order the effect of which was to continue business there; to allow to remain in force the customs duties that had been collected up to that time under Spanish law. His action was in the interest of law and order. Subsequently, after the treaty of peace was signed, instead of Congress taking hold of the matter, the President's order was continued. It turned out, as matter of law, that the President had no authority to make that order. But Congress undertook to ratify the order to legalize the collection of all these customs duties that had been paid into the Philippine treasury.

Mr. TAWNEY. As they had authority to do.

Mr. DALZELL. The Supreme Court of the United States said that the act of Congress was not broad enough to legalize all the customs duties that had been collected. It did not say that Congress could not legalize their collection. On the contrary, the court's decision was, impliedly at least, to the effect that it was in the power of Congress to ratify the President's action, but that Congress had not gone far enough. The proposition now is to ratify, and to do it to-day.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman misstates the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman does not misstate it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The question was, Had Congress the power to ratify?

Mr. DALZELL. The Supreme Court of the United States listened to an argument on the question of whether Congress had ratified the assessment and collection of the sums collected as customs duties. Would not the Supreme Court have been a set of imbiciles if they had listened to a discussion on that subject if they intended to hold that Congress did not have the right to ratify? [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no question of constitutional right or national honor involved in this discussion. No law that we can pass, that Congress can pass, can affect for a single moment the right of any individual citizen, or the right of any citizen of any country on the face of the globe. There is no question of constitutional right. The only question of honor involved is the question of honor in which we are interested—our honor in protecting the Treasury of the United States. [Loud applause.]

What are the equities of these people—these claimants? They have no equities. All they have is iniquity. Why, they paid these customs duties without protest. They paid them in the ordinary course of business. They assumed that they were paying them according to law. They believed they were paying them in accordance with law. They enjoyed the fruits of these customs duties. These customs duties were spent in protecting the lives and the property of the men who paid them. No dollar of them ever went into the Federal Treasury. They went into the treasury of the Philippine Islands; and every man that paid a duty collected that duty off the consumer to whom he sold his goods. [Applause.] He has been repaid now. Oh, the gentleman from Massachusetts smiles. I suppose he assumes that "the gentleman from Pennsylvania" is inconsistent in announcing that doctrine. On the contrary, it is Republican doctrine, that in the case of noncompeting articles the consumer always pays the tax. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] And these were noncompeting articles. My friends, be not deceived. The question, and the only question you are called on to answer in this legislation, is: Will you protect the Treasury against this band of marauders? [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would not detain this eager committee—eager to vote on this question—but the matter involved is one of grave importance, not only as to the pending claims against the United States, but it is one that ought to be settled, and forever, and so that it may be permanent, as affecting similar claims likely to arise in the future.

Similar claims arose after the Mexican war. Like claims arose in San Francisco, and were decided by our Supreme Court years ago on the principle that we had a right to ratify the acts of the officers who continued to collect import duties after the war, as we had been doing pending the Mexican war. Now, it is not a question here of usurpation of power by the President, as was stated in the opening remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi when he said that after the ratification of the treaty on April 11, 1899, the President of the United States usurped the power to insist upon collecting duties when he no longer had such power. That was not the case. Our officers who were collecting duties in the Philippine Islands commenced doing that under a Presidential order in August, 1898, and this continued under an order of the President up to April 11, 1899, and then still continued until the time came when Congress passed a law and put in operation the machinery necessary to collect duties in the Philippine Islands as provided in a law of Congress applicable to these islands. It is not justified by anything that took place to make the statement that the President of the United States assumed to do these things in violation of law. As was said by both gentlemen from Pennsylvania, it was understood that the duties were being lawfully collected. They were collected under the forms of law, and they were paid by people, importers who volunteered to go there and do business, pay the import duties, and sell their goods. They volunteered to pay, and there was no confiscation of property, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN]. They were not obliged to pay their money that went into the treasury of the Philippine Islands. The payments were voluntary; the importers knew when they took in their goods that they would be required to pay duties.

Now, it was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] that this obligation does not rest on the United States as against foreigners who traded there. As I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], he said it was decided in the Barnes case that the foreign importers had no rights against the Government. An examination of that decision will show that there is no distinction as to rights and liabilities among the importers who paid duties; and the Secretary of War is right in saying, as he does in a communication before me, that the claims presented by people trading from the United States and by these foreigners stand on an equal footing, and without this provision becomes a law this country will be liable to pay about $15,000,000 out of its Treasury, although no dollar of it went into it.

Now, I think sufficient has been said upon the legal question involved, and I know the committee is ready to vote, and I will give way. The right to, by law, ratify the collection of these duties is completely settled by numerous Supreme Court decisions, and especially in what is here called the "Barnes case," found in 197 United States, 429. There was no division among the justices of the Supreme Court in that case on the question of the right of Congress to ratify the illegal collection of import duties.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is really, I think, a very simple one. First, is there any authority for this legislation—whether it would be valid or invalid? Without taking time to go into the law questions involved, I think it may fairly be inferred and reasonably understood from the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases under consideration with reference to this matter that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to make valid acts performed by the Government, through agents of the Government and for the Government, which of themselves without that ratification or Congressional sanction are invalid. If that is not true, the adoption of this provision would work nobody any harm. So the real question is as to the merits.

There were collected of a number of persons import and export duties in the Philippines, the proceeds being devoted to and used by the Philippine government. Of course it goes without saying that every one of those persons who paid a duty added the duty to the price or value of the article which he sold, and so got his tax money back. Then, as an actual matter of fact, not a single one of those persons is out a solitary cent on account of these exactions.

Not a single cent of the money collected went into the Treasury of the United States, and yet if this legislation be defeated there may be taken out of the Treasury of the United States—that is, out of the pockets of the American people—millions of dollars—anywhere from three million to fifteen million dollars. It comes really to be a question of right and wrong, or a balancing of equities, if you may assume that there are equities on both sides, between the claimants, on bare technicalities, and the real, substantial rights of the people of these United States. The actual question before us is, Shall we keep the people's money in the Treasury, or shall we pay it out as an absolute gratuity to those who get it, who have already been reimbursed in the increased prices for their wares for every cent they paid out?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. On that point the former Speaker of this House, John G. Carlisle, has stated, in reference to this argument of inequity, that the charge that they had added the duty to the prices of their goods is unsupported by a shred of testimony.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Very well, Mr. Chairman; it is supported by the great body of common sense and common experience. Then, in addition to the equities, upon the one side of this question is the opinion of the Secretary of War, a profound lawyer, concerned in this matter only on behalf of the Government and the people who are interested in guarding the Public Treasury—only on behalf of the Government and the people who are interested in the Government—and upon the other side is the opinion of a great lawyer, John G. Carlisle, and his associates, who, perhaps, also are great lawyers, in the interest of their clients and themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if it is not necessarily the fact that every one of these claimants when he shipped his goods to the Philippine Islands must have known of the existence of the duty and voluntarily sent his goods to the Philippine Islands instead of selling them elsewhere, knowing that the result of the transaction was that he would have to pay the duty and not be reimbursed?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of course, Mr. Chairman; and it was but the continuance as to this matter of existing conditions, and there was not a particle of surprise upon anybody, and if there had not been by some sort of authority, well founded or founded in error, if you please, some such imposition of duties and some such collections for the gathering in of revenue, the Government might not have been carried on, and these claimants might as well have had no goods to sell, because there would have been nobody to buy them, and nobody to protect them until they could be sold. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER]. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York and then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALZELL. And I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts will be voted down.

There was no objection; and the Clerk again read the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of contributing toward the expenses of the national encampment of the United Spanish War Veterans, to be held in the city of Washington, D. C., in October, 1906, to be paid out on the order of the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee of the national encampment of the United Spanish War Veterans of the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this is a small sum compared to what has hitherto been appropriated for the purpose of paying a part or all of the expenses of national Grand Army of the Republic encampments held in the city of Washington. About $90,000 was appropriated in one form or another for the first Grand Army encampment, and at the last one there was an appropriation of about $25,000. The United Spanish War Veterans' national encampment is to be held here this year. It was believed by the committee of the United Spanish War Veterans, as some of its members tell me, that there would ordinarily be no difficulty in raising enough money for their purpose, but when the earthquake came and solicitations were made in the city of Washington for the sufferers in San Francisco, it was found that they were unable to collect any considerable amount for the coming encampment. The total amount of expenses that they have incurred is about $10,000. This proposition of mine is to pay only one-half of the expenses. It is a very small sum, as it is expected that the Spanish war veterans from every State in this Union will assemble here in October. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw the point of order, as the sum is a very small one compared with like appropriations in the past.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These national encampments are a great financial benefit to the city where they are held. It is customary for the citizens to raise the money to defray certain expenses. Members seem to hesitate to make a point of order against such a provision as this for fear of political retaliation.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, there is no politics in it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe that the vigorous young men members of the Spanish War Veterans are in favor of applying to Congress for any part of the expenses for that purpose, and I insist on the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. This motion of mine is made on the authority and at the request of the committee in this city that has this matter in charge, and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRUMPACKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the general deficiency bill and had made sundry amendments thereto and instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross.

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, I want to demand a separate vote on the Cherokee Indian appropriation matter, on page 65, line 15.

The SPEAKER. That provision seems to be a part of the bill.

Mr. WALDO. It is a separate provision of the bill, and I want to take a separate vote on the amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. But that seems to be a part of the bill. The committee reported back the bill with several amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WALDO. But there was a motion made to strike out that amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the motion did not prevail.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken in gross. [After a pause.] The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be considered as engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, and on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Although the gentleman was a little late, still it was equivalent to an objection; so that as the Chair put it, that without objection the bill would be considered as engrossed and read a third time and passed, the gentleman coming as he did a little late no doubt intended to object, and therefore the Chair will treat it as an objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only thing to which I objected was the last portion of it. There was no objection to the first two provisions, and then I asked to be recognized before the last motion is agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It was submitted in its entirety, and an objection voids the whole request. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LITTAUER. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Mr. LITTAUER, moves to recommit, and the Chair will state to the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITZGERALD, in fairness to him, that while the gentleman did apply for recognition prior to the third reading, and has again applied at this time to move to recommit, yet under the usual parliamentary procedure the friends of the bill are entitled to recognition over those who would attack it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me, I do not dispute that that is the practice, but since the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTAUER] did not ask to be recognized until the suggestion was made to him, and I had made my request previous to that suggestion, I submit in fairness I should be recognized at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that was in the shape of a notice to the Chair that the gentleman desired to be recognized; but after that, the Chair still keeping notice and quite well understanding that the gentleman did desire to be recognized, a motion was put and carried for a third reading of an engrossed bill. The bill was read a third time, and then for the first time the motion to recommit was in order and the gentleman did not obtain any rights until he had been recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the Speaker turned his head away. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Therefore the Chair, pursuing the usual parliamentary usage, recognized the gentleman's colleague on the committee to move to recommit the bill, upon which motion he demands the previous question. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 140, noes 56.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTAUER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PERSONAL REQUEST.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HOGG was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CURTIS was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Cruzen's Christian Chronology, H. R. 11724, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WAKELAND HERESFORD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 4599) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Wakeland Heresford, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

SETH DAVIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12892) granting an honorable discharge to Seth Davis, with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, about which I have some doubt, which I will leave to the Speaker, I move, as a substitute, that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock, and that from 8 o'clock until the hour of 11 the House shall debate the question of the general administrative bill, and that the time be equally divided between the two parties.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of order against the amendment, Mr. Speaker. I will state, however, that the object is for debate upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair the amendment is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York were to retire from the Chamber a minute, I think I could get unanimous consent, but I am a little afraid that with him here I could not.

Mr. PAYNE. I am a little afraid the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, is overconfident about unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I will object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division, so that if this motion is voted down we can then get the other one just in the interest of fair play.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 135, noes 62.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask whether in the gentleman's motion he has fixed any time at which the House should adjourn?

Mr. PAYNE. There was no time fixed in the motion.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Speaker announces the result may I present a conference report for printing on the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a conference report can interrupt, under the precedents, a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. It is for printing in the RECORD only.

The SPEAKER. Well, without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it; and the House is in recess until 8 o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. GROSVENOR, Speaker pro tempore.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19750) to amend the act to simplify the collection of the revenue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19750.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MINOR].

Mr. MINOR. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that this first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress is approaching the hour of adjournment without having had an opportunity to fairly discuss, consider, and, as I believe it would have done, pass the bill commonly known and designated as the "merchant-marine shipping bill."

In my judgment no more important or far-reaching question confronts the American people at this time than that of rehabilitating our merchant marine engaged in the foreign or over-sea trade. Each year we witness the passing away of the American ship. Each year witnesses the rapid disappearance of the American flag floating from the masthead of the American ship, built in American yards by American workmen, ladened with American products that seek the markets of foreign lands. Three thousand millions of dollars measures the value of the exports and imports of this magnificent and blessed country of ours. The balance of trade under this Republican Administration has surpassed all limits ever conceived by man. We produce more than any people in the world, and carry less across the sea to foreign lands than any nation in the world that pretends to anything above a fifth-class power, either in peace or war. We pay to foreign shipowners each day of every year not less than $500,000 in gold, or its equivalent, for the transportation of people and products to and from our shores. Out of the more than forty millions of tons of freight brought in and taken out of our ports only about 10 per cent in freightage is paid to American bottoms. Ninety per cent is carried by foreign ships whose owners have no interest in our people or our Government beyond the collection of the freight on the products exported and imported. From a commercial standpoint we are helpless when it comes to the regulation of freight rates, because the 90 per cent will surely control the 10 per cent. From a military point of view we are in a still more deplorable condition. We may, and we are, building up a navy that is the pride of the nation. Our battle ships and armored cruisers are the peers of any that float on the bosom of the oceans and seas of the earth. The officers and men of our Navy have no superiors—and we may be pardoned for believing they have no equals, man for man—but we haven't enough of them to man our fleets, and never can have till we have more American ships for American commerce, for it is there we must look for help in time of war.

Our Navy is now costing us more than one hundred millions of dollars each year, and very soon, if we continue our present naval policy, we will be compelled to take from the Treasury of the United States fifty millions additional; but be it one hundred or two hundred millions each year for naval ships and their maintenance in time of peace, what will be their value in time of war unless we have men to man them? And unless we have a merchant marine where are we to look for seamen to man our Navy in time of need? The man behind the gun sank the Spanish fleets, and the man that sights and fires the guns will win the battles of the future; but you can not take him out of the cornfield and off the plains to-day and expect him to win the nation's battles to-morrow. The Blue Jackets, that should be and are the pride of our people because they in the last analysis win our victories, must have sea training—sea legs, if you please—and these qualifications do not come from running a cultivator in a cornfield or riding a cow pony on the plains of the boundless West, but they do come from sea service on our merchant marine.

Every patriotic American citizen may be proud of our achievement. Our people are progressive, enterprising, and filled with a genius unsurpassed by any people inhabiting the globe. We have outstripped all the nations of the earth by our productive power. We produce more and consume more than any people in the world; but this is only one side of the picture. We look upon this with pride and satisfaction. What of the other side? We see ourselves wholly at the mercy of the grasping nations of the earth, carrying to foreign lands our products at rates fixed by themselves, having no interest in our welfare beyond our ability to pay the freightage they have decreed that our products shall pay. [Great applause.]

Mr. Chairman, my time is limited, therefore I can not discuss this question as I had hoped to on the floor of the House, but I shall ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and in doing this I shall treat the question from the standpoint of the agricultural interests of the Middle West.

Mr. Chairman, "What is Nebraska going to get out of this legislation?" good-humoredly asked a western Representative at a recent hearing on the shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the National House.

This is an entirely pertinent and valid question. What is the great West going to get out of this measure if enacted into law? What are the farmers of the country to receive in the way of benefit from an expenditure beginning at one or two millions and rising gradually at ten years to perhaps five or six million dollars a year?

It is a question which must be met by some straightforward, satisfying answer. What advantage will come to the farmers, especially to the farmers of the Mississippi Valley, of the grain and cotton States, from national aid for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine in foreign commerce?

The reply is that 55 per cent in value and far more than that in bulk of our entire export commerce during the fiscal year

1905 consisted of various products of agriculture. This means that the average American farmer, especially the western farmer, has more at stake in the prosperity of our sea-borne commerce than the producers of any other trade in the United States, and to the prosperity of this commerce adequate transportation facilities and fair freight rates are indispensable.

WHAT M'KINLEY AND ROOSEVELT SAID.

"Next in advantage to having the thing to sell," declared President William McKinley in that last memorable speech of September 5, 1901, at Buffalo, "is to have the convenience to carry it to the buyer." And with the farms of the country especially in mind, William McKinley added:

We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans.

President Theodore Roosevelt, taking these thoughts, as it were, from the lips of his great predecessor, declared a few months later, in his first message to Congress, December 3, 1901:

The condition of the American merchant marine is such as to call for immediate remedial action by the Congress. It is discreditable to us as a nation that our merchant marine should be utterly insignificant in comparison to that of other nations which we overtop in other forms of business. We should not longer submit to conditions under which only a trifling portion of our great commerce is carried in our own ships. To remedy this state of things would not merely serve to build up our shipping interests, but it would also result in benefit to all who are interested in the permanent establishment of a wider market for American products and would provide an auxiliary force for the Navy.

WHAT THE SHIPPING BILL DOES.

This shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission, prepared by a special commission which President Roosevelt recommended, embodies an honest effort to fulfill this patriotic counsel of two great and wise Executives. It is a bill, not for fast and luxurious passenger ships carrying pleasure tourists to Europe—not one dollar is provided for a new line of this description—but for capacious, moderate-speed mail and cargo liners to South America, Africa, the Orient, and other distant markets, and for the useful, hard-working "delivery-wagon" type of ships, called "tramps," particularly adapted for the export of such things as lumber, grain, flour, cotton, cattle, and provisions.

No bill of just this kind, with all the emphasis laid on cargo-carrying ships, has ever been before the American Congress. It is a radical departure, and a departure deliberately chosen by the Commission which framed the bill. It determined at the outset that no effort should be made to rival European governments in the gorgeous floating palaces of the rich, but that every dollar of the proposed subventions should be directed to providing improved shipping facilities, a more regular service, and more equitable rates for the products of American farms and factories that every year seek an ever-widening outlet in the neutral markets over seas.

Europe is a great shipowning continent. It is also a great manufacturing continent. It requires immense quantities of our food stuffs and crude materials, and, having the ships, it sends them to our ports for this needful merchandise. Therefore there are already better shipping facilities in the European trade than any other, and though it is a perilous and costly expedient for the United States to rely even in this European trade entirely on the marine delivery wagons of European nations, yet the need of more American ships does not begin to be so urgent as it is and long has been in our half-developed commerce with the other continents.

FOLLOWING ALLISON'S COUNSEL.

Therefore the Merchant Marine Commission, in framing the present shipping bill, followed the wise suggestions of the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa. In an address October 3, 1903, at Clinton, Mr. ALLISON, speaking of this very question of our commercial expansion, had said:

Our efforts should be turned to these countries lying near us as well as to South America and Asia. The latter field is likely to be of inestimable value in the near future, stimulated as it has been by the presence of our flag in those distant seas, where three-fifths of the population of the globe is to be supplied in the future with the products of the more civilized nations.

In this struggle we will have the active and close competition of Europe. We have advantage in distance, and will soon have, if we have not now, the advantage of facilities. American ships must float there, and the American flag must be seen there and dwell there, and our Government can well afford to provide especial aid to our merchant marine to extend our trade there, and in south Africa and South America as well.

ALL NEW COMMERCIAL LINES.

Every one of the important new mail lines proposed in this bill runs to the ports of either Asia, South Africa, or South America. This fact is of very great significance to the farmers of the United States. For, as has been said, our steamship service to Europe, though now monopolized almost entirely by foreign flags, is relatively the most satisfactory, or, it would be more precise to say, the least unsatisfactory service in existence. Not one American steamship runs regularly to any port of South America south of Venezuela and the Isthmus of Panama. Not one American steamship runs to Africa. There are a few American steamships, but no such complete and regular service as this bill contemplates, running across the Pacific to Japan, China, and the Philippines.

The foreign steamships which go out in haphazard fashion from New York and other American ports to South America are, as a rule, poor, uneconomical, unreliable craft, of the second or third class, operated by foreign houses which keep their best ships at home and give their chief attention to their main lines from their home ports to South America. Not content with their absolute monopoly of our South American commerce, these foreign concerns running to Brazil, Argentina, and elsewhere maintain a "combine" or trust for their further enrichment from the pockets of American manufacturers, farmers, and merchants.

As President Roosevelt said in December, 1905, in his annual message to Congress:

It can not but be a source of regret and uneasiness to us that the lines of communication with our sister republics of South America should be chiefly under foreign control.

FOREIGN STEAMSHIP MONOPOLISTS.

These foreign steamship combinations which throttle our South American trade and prevent any increase in our sales of flour and provisions to those tropical countries raising no such foodstuffs of their own, have been fully described in the official reports of our ministers and consuls to their Government. The methods of these foreign "combines" are the familiar methods of monopoly everywhere—and American farmers are their especial victims.

Brazil is the greatest country of South America. It has an area north and south of the equator equal to the whole area of the United States. Of course, no wheat can be grown in that tropical climate, and very little of the cereals that require temperate conditions. The same thing is true of live stock of many kinds. Brazil, therefore, is compelled to import huge quantities of flour, lard, bacon, and other agricultural products, and in the years when there were American ships on the ocean it used to import these products chiefly from the United States.

Now, however, that our unprotected shipping has been almost driven from the seas, our farmers have been losing the Brazilian market. In 1895 Brazil imported from this country goods to the value of $15,135,000. But in 1905 Brazil imported from this country goods to the value of only $10,985,000. This decrease in our export trade to Brazil—due directly to the lack of American ships and to the unjust discriminations of foreign shipowners—occurred chiefly in the products of agriculture, and the loss fell almost altogether on the farmers of the Northwest and the Mississippi Valley—on the very men who are assured by European steamship agents that the farmers of this country are not interested in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine.

CUTTING OFF THE BRAZIL FLOUR TRADE.

Thus our farmers sold $2,683,000 worth of wheat flour to Brazil in 1895, and only $1,225,000 worth in 1905. The Brazilian people need as much flour as they ever did. They consume as much and they pay as much money for it. But they are buying most of their flour now from Argentina and Austria-Hungary and other countries than the United States; and the chief reason why they are buying it from these other countries is that these countries have ships of their own to deliver their goods, while American farmers are dependent for their transportation facilities and freight rates upon the tender mercies of European steamship trusts and combinations.

Austria-Hungary subsidizes ships. It subsidizes a line of its own to South America. Having the advantage of this subsidy, the Austrian steamers can carry goods at a low rate, and they give the goods of their own country the preference. The result is that, though flour in Austria-Hungary costs more per barrel than flour in the United States, yet because of the lower freight rates the Austrian flour can be laid down at Rio Janeiro at a price as low or lower than American flour exported in the ships of the European steamship monopoly from New York.

If there were an American steamship line, managed in American interests and aided by our Government, running between this country and Brazil, this discrimination of the foreign shipowning monopoly against American farmers and other producers would not be possible.

HOW ONE AMERICAN LINE WAS KILLED.

Years ago there was an American line to Brazil, established without a subsidy by American merchants who attempted to break foreign monopoly of our ocean carrying. While these American ships ran our exports to Brazil were about $15,000,000 a year and increasing. But the foreign steamship companies, including those running out from Europe that were heavily subsidized, all combined to make war on the one American line, and, being older, richer, and more powerful, they drove it to the verge of bankruptcy.

Then these American steamship managers appealed to Congress for a mail subsidy, or subvention, that would protect them against the foregin "combine" and enable them to continue to run and to build up the commerce of the American people. Such a subvention was favored by most of the Republican Representatives, and would have been granted had not enough Republicans from the Middle West joined with the free traders of the solid South to defeat the appropriation.

The American line to Brazil could not fight unaided and alone the European steamship combination supported by the treasuries of European Governments. Therefore its new ships—the best ships that had been seen in South American waters—were withdrawn and sold. The service was abandoned; the Stars and Stripes went down in defeat. The foreign steamship "combine" was triumphant. Of course it immediately proceeded to raise its freight rates so high that American merchants soon found that it was often cheaper to send their flour to Europe in one foreign ship and then out to South America in another foreign ship—thus paying two freights to foreign shipowners—than it was to send the flour out direct from New York to Rio Janeiro.

A Rio commission house made a profit by shipping flour from New York to Europe and thence to Rio, although the increased difference of tarvel was over 3,000 miles. (Consul-General Seeger.)

DESTRUCTIVE "ECONOMY."

The United States Congress had refused a mail subvention of $200,000 a year. But it had destroyed the one American steamship line to South America, and had thrown away an export commerce of $4,000,000 a year—for, instead of increasing, our exports to Brazil now fell off from $15,000,000 to $11,000,000. Was there ever a more vivid example of saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung?

This loss of American commerce with Brazil, as has been shown, was chiefly in the products of the agriculture of the Middle West and Northwest. It came directly out of the pockets of the farmer constituents of the western Representatives who had voted with the solid South to refuse to aid the American steamship line in its fierce fight with the subsidized foreign monopoly.

Once in complete possession of our Brazil trade, the European steamship companies proceeded to adopt all the familiar extortionate methods of trusts and combinations the world over. As Consul-General Seeger at Rio Janeiro reported to his Government in Washington:

Since March 15 the freight rates established by the European steamship trust, controlling the transportation between Brazil and the United States, are 40 cents and 5 per cent primage per bag of 160 kilograms (132 pounds) between Rio and New York. Since last August the freights have been raised and lowered and raised again to suit the purpose of the trust till they have reached their present level. * * * The trust has an agreement with coffee shippers here to pay them a rebate of 5 per cent at the end of every six months from the date of the agreement on all freights collected; provided, however, that this rebate is forfeited in case the shippers give freight to any vessel not belonging to the trust during the period stipulated. Through this arrangement the trust controls the shippers and American vessels go home in ballast.

Having thus, by the merciless use of rebates, excluded American vessels from all chance of securing return cargoes from Brazil to the United States, the European steamship trust prevented American ships from competing with the foreign trust ships for outward cargoes of flour, provisions, machinery, and other things from American ports to Rio Janeiro. The Stars and Stripes have, therefore, practically disappeared from our commerce with the greatest country of South America.

AT THE MERCY OF A FOREIGN "COMBINE."

Says an American merchant, writing in American Trade:

Our commerce with Brazil and the river Plata countries is at the mercy of such a shipping combine. Ostensibly four lines are competing in "serving" the route between New York and Pernambuco southward, viz, the Lamport & Holt Line, Prince Line, Norton Line, all British, and the R. M. Sloman Line, which is German. In reality, however, the management of these services is centralized in Liverpool, the freights are pooled, and the spoils divided pro rata.

At the head of this syndicate stands Lamport & Holt, of Liverpool, a powerful firm owning and managing over a hundred vessels. The ships engaged in the New York-South American service are mostly slow and obsolete, steaming 8 to 10 knots an hour, and yet the rates of freight levied on American cargo are nearly double those charged by the speedy, modern, elegant ships plying between Europe and the east coast of South America. Not a case of kerosene or a bag of coffee can escape paying toll to this freight ring, and there was more truth than comedy in the facetious request sent by a Rio shipper to the syndicate's agents at that port asking for a permit to ship some coffee on an outside vessel over their ocean.

CHOKING AMERICAN TRADE.

With freight rates by the foreign trust ships "nearly double" the rates on the lines running out from Europe, need the farmers of the West wonder that they are losing their valuable Brazilian market—that their sales of American flour fell from 526,000 barrels in 1902 to 337,000 barrels in 1905? Our American flour is very much superior to the Argentine flour. It is preferred by Brazilian consumers. But because a European steamship monopoly has our Brazilian commerce by the throat, the Brazilian Review remarks that—

Argentine flour has entirely monopolized the south, Rio, and Santos, has driven the American article from Bahia and Victoria, and is already competing vigorously in the markets of Pernambuco.

The remedy for all this, declares the American merchant writing in American Trade, is "an independent American line of steamships." Against the rich, unscrupulous, and formidable European combination, such an American line would need national aid by subvention or subsidy at first. "There is no doubt that the early stages of the existence of an American steamship line to Brazil would be stormy, but faster service, better and more economical ships, together with fairer business methods must win in the end, enfranchise American commerce from this foreign despotism, and secure for our own glory and enjoyment the trophy of American trade on American ships."

ON THE WEST COAST ALSO.

But Brazil is not the only South American country where American farmers, manufacturers, and other producers are being robbed of their fair share of trade by the hostility and greed of the foreign shipowners, on whom we depend to do our ocean carrying. Special Agent Lincoln Hutchinson, after long observation throughout South America, reports to the Department of Commerce and Labor:

As in Brazil, so in Chile and the river La Plata, there is universal complaint that the mail service to and from the United States is inadequate. If the trouble were only in the length of time required for the delivery of mails the inconvenience would be sufficiently great, but far more serious is the irregularity, infrequency, and uncertainty of the service.

On the important question of cargo steamship service, Mr. Hutchinson further says:

Freighting facilities from New York to Chile and the river Plata are inferior to those from Europe, both as regards frequency, regularity, and time required for delivery, and as to rates.

As to Ecuador, on the west coast of South America, this emphatic testimony to the injury done to American commerce by the lack of American ships is given by Hon. Archibald J. Simpson, the American minister:

I was informed recently by a prominent merchant here that he would like to deal with New York, but that the freight rates from that city on some of his purchases were fivefold greater when received at Guayaquil than on like freight from Hamburg, which was a practical prohibition on American trade.

Germany has direct steamship lines of her own to both coasts of South America.

NULLIFYING THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

The Monroe doctrine holds that the influence of the United States is, and by right ought to be, paramount in South America; that we shall never permit European aggression on or spoliation of the Latin-American Republics. But while we are proclaiming this doctrine, Europe is adroitly and persistently enforcing a Monroe doctrine of her own. She is proceeding to the commercial annexation of South America. Not only has our export trade to Brazil been actually decreasing, but of the great and flourishing commerce of Argentina, amounting now to between $300,000,000 and $400,000,000 annually, the share of the United States in export trade is only about 14 per cent. Not only is Great Britain far ahead of us, but Germany is ahead. France and Italy are surpassing us in enterprise, and since the close of the war with Russia even Japan, with a direct, subsidized steamship line, has entered the field as a competitor.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN "COMBINE."

And South America is not the only continent where foreign steamship combinations are permitted to suppress American trade in the interest of the farmers and manufacturers of Europe. There was a time when the United States exported large quantities of flour, provisions, lumber, and other agricultural products to South Africa. A few years ago our South African exports reached the handsome figure of $30,000,000. But of late years there has been a significant decline in our exports, while the exports of Canada to South Africa have increased enormously since the establishment of a subsidized British steamship service from Montreal and Halifax to Cape Town and Natal.

One cause of this increase of Canadian and decrease of American exports to South Africa is thus described in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of April 14, 1906:

FREIGHT RATES INCREASED—COMPLAINTS OF SHIPPERS ARE OF NO AVAIL.

Consul Hollis, of Laurenço Marquez, writes that it is a well-known fact to all engaged in South African trade that the freight rates between New York and South and East Africa have been steadily raised during the past few months, until they now stand at figures about 75 per cent higher than those of six months ago.

The consul continues:

This increase in rates has been brought about by the independent lines (I might almost say line, for there was really only one independent line) joining the "conference," which fixes the freight rates between England and South Africa and between New York and South Africa as well.

* * * * * * *

"With regard to the rebate system, it appears that under the laws of England, as well as those of the South African colonies, the steamship companies have a perfect right to grant or to withhold rebates as they see fit. Payments of rebates are always deferred for many months, and the unfortunate shipper who may happen to ship by any vessel outside of the 'conference' lines can thus be deprived of all of his deferred rebates and with no chance of being able to recover them even by suit at law."

BRITISH SHIPS FAVORING CANADA.

Of course these British steamship trust magnates have arranged their freight rates and their elaborate rebate systems so as to discriminate against American farmers and lumbermen in our commerce with South Africa. American Consul-General Washington at Cape Town thus reports to Washington:

A trade report received here from New York, dated August 1, 1905, quoted the rates for the next direct steamer from that port to Cape Town as not exceeding $6.70 per ton, to East London and Durban $7.91, and the September sailing (by subsidized steamer) from Montreal at $4.26 for Cape Town and Port Elizabeth and $4.87 to East London and Durban.

What this means is that the freight rates on flour, lumber, provisions, etc., from the American port of New York are fixed by the British steamship combination at from $2 to $3 a ton above the rates on similar products shipped from Canadian ports to South Africa. Doubtless the agents and attorneys of this British steamship combination are spending a great deal of time and money to persuade the farmers of Michigan, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and Minnesota that they have no interest whatever in the upbuilding of American shipping, and that the bill which President Roosevelt is urging is simply a scheme to enrich the shipbuilders of New England, New York, and Pennsylvania.

AN EAST INDIA TRUST ALSO.

But the arrogance and greed of these foreign steamship monopolists do not stop even with South Africa. Another trust is smothering our commerce with the Far East. An American merchant familiar with the facts has written thus to the Merchant Marine Commission:

There is a combination under the name of the "conference lines," which runs from New York to Manila, Hongkong, Yokohama, and Kobe, all English and foreign-owned steamers. The New York representatives of the conference lines are Barber & Co.; Funch, Edye & Co.; the American-Asiatic Steamship Company, and Howard, Houlder & Rowat. These lines work together; their sailings do not conflict, and they absolutely control rates. If you telephone to Funch, Edye & Co. for a rate to Manila, and they do not have the first steamer sailing, they will refer you to one of the conference lines steamers. If a large block of tonnage is to be shipped, and they fear competition from others, they have to cable to the head of the conference lines, in England, for a special rate. You can readily see that we need assistance to American steamers to break up this combination.

And the statement of this American merchant is thus confirmed in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of March 14, 1906, by American Consul-General Wilber at Singapore:

In regard to the matter of advance in freight rates, there is in existence a shipping conference, composed of lines running out of New York to far eastern ports. This conference is a combination, or pool, and is composed in part of the Barber Line, East Asiatic, and some of the Standard Oil steamships, all of which are under the English flag. In this pool also is the Hamburg-American Line. A rebate of 10 per cent is paid to all shippers at the end of each year, providing said Shippers have patronized no vessels outside of the conference. If they have done so, they lose this rebate. Consequently the combination controls the freight both ways between Atlantic coast ports and the Far East.

This is a move on the part of the European conference to aid English and German dealers in East Indian products to regain control of the business, which they have been gradually losing. What is needed throughout this section of the world is an American line of steamers under the American flag, running from New York through the Suez Canal to the far eastern ports regularly every two weeks, and entirely independent of any conference or combination.

MOST AUDACIOUS OF MONOPOLIES.

A contest for the regulation of railroad rates and the prevention of rebates and other forms of discrimination has just been carried to a successful issue in the Congress of the United States. In this fight the West has been the leader, and the influence of the farmers has been powerful.

But far more audacious monopoly, more oppressive rebates, more outrageous discriminations than were ever dreamed of on land are being practiced right along by unprincipled foreign steamship combinations against the ocean commerce of the American people. Those foreign steamship monopolists, who have waxed fat and insolent on the tribute long wrung from the export trade of American farmers, manufacturers, and merchants, now actually have the effrontery to tell our western farmers that this foreign monopoly is a good thing for them—that it is a good thing to have the delivery of our products overseas absolutely controlled by our political rivals and commercial competitors!

THE WARNING OF OUR PRESIDENTS.

The soundest and best American statesmanship has for years been combating this delusion. Said President Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana:

Our great competitors have established and maintained their lines by government subsidies until they have now practically excluded us from participation. In my opinion, no choice is left to us but to pursue, moderately at least, the same lines.

Said President William McKinley, of Ohio:

If the United States would give the same encouragement to her merchant marine and her steamship lines as is given by other nations to their ships, this commerce on the seas under the American flag would increase and multiply. When the United States will spend from her Treasury from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 a year for that purpose, as do France and Great Britain to maintain their steamship lines, our ships will plow every sea in successful competition with the ships of the world.

Says President Theodore Roosevelt, of New York:

Ships work for their own countries just as railroads work for their terminal points. Shipping lines, if established to the principal countries with which we have dealings, would be of political as well as commercial benefit. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods. It should be made advantageous to carry American goods in American-built ships.

AMERICAN SHIPS UNDER AMERICAN LAW.

"Ah," but it may be urged by the opposition, "if we had American-built ships, could they not also, as well as the foreigners, form combination 'in restraint of trade?'" They could, undoubtedly, or they could try it. But they would certainly be less disposed to try, because they would be American companies naturally and primarily interested in the expansion of American trade, while these foreign steamship companies, whose shares are owned by the manufacturers, farmers, and merchants of the Old World, are interested primarily in the expansion of the trade and industry of Europe.

Moreover, American steamship companies, organized here, domiciled here, officered by American citizens, can be held directly answerable to American law, which apparently finds it impossible to reach and destroy all these foreign steamship trusts, "conferences," and combinations.

The foreign steamship companies that monopolize our trade with South America, South Africa, and the Orient are not domiciled in the United States. They have, at the most, a few agencies here. Their managers are alien born, of alien allegiance. Their policies are shaped, their orders are received, from Liverpool, London, Bremen, Havre, or Hamburg. They snap their fingers at the United States. They scorn American law. They deride our flag and our Government.

The American people ought never to forget the names of the two great German steamship companies which, in the crisis of our war with Spain, deliberately took fast steamers out of their New York service—ships built for and supported by American trade—and transferred them to the Spanish Admiralty to raid the commerce and sink the coastwise ships of the United States.

What these cynical and selfish foreign steamship monopolists have done once they will do again and again if we give them an opportunity.

TRADE FOLLOWS THE FLAG.

There are reasons far more potent than considerations of sentiment why the use of American ships is advantageous to American commerce. And yet mere sentiment—the sight of the flag—is potent in itself, as all travelers and observers, merchants, and officials have repeatedly testified. In South America, in Africa, in the Orient the appearance of a noble, great steamship bearing the Stars and Stripes instantly has the effect, in some real though indefinable way, of increasing interest in and demand for American merchandise.

There are other ways, however, very specific, very practical, in which American ships help directly to upbuild American commerce. A British or a German vessel carrying an American cargo from New York or New Orleans to Rio Janiero or Buenos Ayres is interested merely in arriving safely at its destination; that is all.

The British or German officers and crew care nothing for American trade. Their whole desire naturally is for the spread of British or of German commerce. So, also, with the agents of the ship or the consignees of the cargo ashore. They are the agents and representatives of British or German manufacturers or merchants, and not only have no interest in increasing the sales of American goods in South America, but have a vital interest in discouraging the sale of all goods that compete with their own and in keeping American trade as small as possible.

HOW COMMERCE GROWS.

When there were American ships in our trade with South America, Africa, and the Orient, there were American agents, American mercantile houses in those distant countries to push the sales of American goods. But when the ships disappeared these American houses also vanished, for it is the unvarying experience of all commercial nations that their first foothold is gained in foreign markets through the agents sent out to look after their shipping business. These agencies develop into regular mercantile establishments handling the goods and advancing the interests of their own manufacturers and farmers and merchants at home. Presently, as their trade increases, they require banking facilities, and a banking institution also devoted to pushing the trade of the home country is started. Thus there is in the foreign port all the equipment necessary to transact a prosperous and expanding commerce.

But you can not have these agencies, you can not have these mercantile establishments, you can not have these banks to promote American export trade to foreign lands unless first you have American shipping. Wherever we have tried to establish banks and agencies, without ships behind them, we have invariably failed. And wherever we have lost our steamship lines we have lost our commercial facilities also.

CAN NOT DEPEND ON FOREIGNERS.

The files of the State Department, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, are crowded with the declarations of American ministers and consuls that it is as shortsighted and as foolish to depend upon foreign houses to promote the sales of American goods as it would be for a merchant in any American city to close his store and discharge his clerks and then to try to sell his goods over the counters of his competitors.

Minister Hicks, writing from Santiago, Chile, of the urgent need of an American steamship service, says:

It seems unfortunate that almost the entire trade of this region should be in the hands of Europeans, and that American products should be largely crowded out by those of Italy, Germany, France, and Great Britain. Chile is a rich and prosperous country, and its consumption of goods manufactured abroad is enormous, yet the trade is almost entirely in the hands of Europeans.

Consul Anderson, at Amoy, bears like testimony, saying that—

A very large portion of American trade in China at the present time is in the hands of foreigners, notably citizens of Great Britain. The natural disposition of such men is to deal in British goods. Most of them commenced business in the East by dealing in British goods exclusively. Their interests, prejudices, and business connections, as a rule, lead them to prefer British goods wherever possible.

Special Agent Burrill, writing from South China in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of March 18, 1906, says:

With the possible exceptions of flour, kerosene oil, sewing machines, cigarettes and tobacco, and canned goods, there are no American goods imported into Hongkong (the great entry port of the Orient) which are represented by Americans. This condition is a serious handicap in the effort to establish and maintain trade in other commodities exported from the United States.

Consul-General Wilber, at Singapore, one of the chief ports of the East Indies, declares:

We sadly lack, and are in need of, American representatives on the ground to push the sale of our goods. Foreign buyers do not want to sell American goods, and will not unless compelled to. And in some instances they have secured American agencies, that they may control and suppress the sale of the goods.

Mr. J. H. Scholes, an American resident in India, writes to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor:

There is not much use in giving American agencies in India and Burma to English firms, as they make little or no effort to sell the goods against those of their own country. Most of the firms in these countries are Scotch, and they are still less inclined to push American wares. Of course, the German firms would not touch them at all.

GIVE US SHIPS FIRST.

Give us American ships and we shall speedily have American agents, American representatives, eager and able to push American goods in the markets of South America, Africa, and the Orient. American sailors, the sons and brothers of American farmers, will have some interest in the freight they are carrying and some determination to help to advance the commerce and the influence of "God's country." To rely on foreign merchants, foreign ships, and foreign seamen to find markets for the products of American farms and factories is weakness and stupidity unworthy of the American character, an affront to American common sense, and a flat surrender of both letter and spirit of the Declaration of Independence.

Suppose another war came upon us, as quickly and inevitably as the Spanish war of 1898. Would these foreign shipowners who have grown rich out of their monopoly of our ocean carrying send their ships to our aid? Would their foreign seamen fight our battles? That was an illuminating lesson which we had in 1898, when we saw the foreign officers and men of the few European ships we did secure scuttling out of these craft like so many rats, unwilling to serve a flag they did not like in a war in which they had no interest.

Fortunately for the country, that war only lasted a hundred days. If we had met with a single defeat, we could not have manned another squadron, even if we could get the ships, for it exhausted all the trained officers and sailors of the United States to man the four battle ships and the skeleton cruiser fleet of 1898. Now, with more battle ships built and ready, our Navy is short of its legal complement more than 5,000 men, because we have lost most of our merchant marine and with it have lost our natural seafaring population. There are just three nations in the world to-day which are in the pitiable condition of lacking a real sea militia—a naval reserve. One of these is the United States; the others are Russia and China. Do the farmers of America like to think that their nation is in such benighted and archaic company?

FOR PEACE AND WAR.

Never were there truer words than those of President Theodore Roosevelt, in his message to Congress December 5, 1905, urging the consideration of the shipping bill of the Merchant Marine Commission:

To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets and in case of need to reenforce our battle line.

These are very great considerations—considerations vital to the prosperity of our commerce and the security of the nation—why the United States should have a merchant marine which are overlooked by those persons who carelessly say, "If foreigners can do our ocean carrying for us more cheaply than we can do it ourselves, why not let them?"

In the first place, the shipping bill now before Congress provides sufficient national aid in the form of subventions to enable American ships to carry our goods as cheaply as the foreigners in spite of their low wages—indeed, to carry our goods more cheaply in most trades. And in the second place, the argument that, if foreigners can do our shipping business more cheaply than we can they ought to be allowed to do so, is an argument which if accepted as valid ought fairly to be applied not alone to shipowners and to seamen, but to manufacturers, farmers, and everybody else. This was very clearly presented by a distinguished Senator, Hon. J. H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, chairman of the Merchant Marine Commission, in a speech of January 8, 1906, on the shipping bill of the Commission, which soon after passed the Senate. Right on this point Senator GALLINGER said:

FREE TRADE RUN MAD.

One of the most frequent and plausible objections urged to a policy of national encouragement to the merchant marine is found in this question, "If foreigners will do this work for us more cheaply than we can do it ourselves, why not let them?" Critically examined, however, it is nothing but the fundamental free-trade argument in the most extreme form in which it is possible to state it. Many years ago this very same plausible argument was familiar in another field—"If England, France, and other countries can make our cotton and woolen fabrics, our tools, and our iron more cheaply than we can, why not let them do so—why not let Europe be the workshop and America the farm?" Of course Europe enthusiastically favored this idea; and Washington, Hamilton, Madison, and other far-seeing statesmen who framed in 1789 our first tariff law "for the encouragement and protection of manufactures" had considerable difficulty in convincing their countrymen of the fallacy of this adroit plea, which foreign interests now exploit in turn against the encouragement of American shipping.

If the argument were admitted as a sound one, that if foreigners will do or make anything for us more cheaply than our own people, they ought to be permitted to do so, then the entire protective system of the United States is rooted in a delusion and ought to be abandoned, root and branch. To admit that this argument is sound is to admit the whole free-trade contention, pure and simple.

APPLY THIS TO THE FARMERS.

This adroit argument of those who are opposed to national aid for American shipping depends for its force very largely on the class of men before whom it is used, or the latitude or longitude in which it is promulgated. To say, "If foreigners can do our ocean carrying more cheaply that we can, why not let them do it?" sounds very persuasive to the farmer of either Massachusetts or Minnesota, who is not himself particularly interested in shipbuilding or ship owning. But put this same argument in another form to the Massachusetts farmer: "If the Canadians can supply eggs and butter and hay and potatoes more cheaply than you can, why not tear down the tariff wall and let them do so?" or to the Minnesota farmer: "If Manitoba can raise wheat for the American market more cheaply than you can, why not repeal the protective duty of 25 cents per bushel and let Manitoba raise our wheat while you sell out and go to work for somebody else?"—the public man who propounded this question in either Massachusetts or Minnesota would find himself a quick candidate for retirement. * * * The American shipowner or seaman is compelled to build and equip his ship in a protected country, to pay protected wages, and to buy protected materials—for, though steel and other things for ships for the deep sea as distinguished from the coast trade are on the free list, nobody dares to avail himself of the privilege so long as there is no encouragement or protection in the deep-sea business. The wages on the ship after she is built are fixed, generally, by the protected wages prevailing in America. Moreover, many foreign ships in our own commerce receive subsidies or bounties, and nearly all are protected and encouraged, if not in this, in some other more subtle but effective way by their own governments.

In the face of all this, to accept the free-trade argument for the shipowner and seaman alone, and to say to them, "Here, if the foreigners can do your trade of ocean carrying more cheaply than you can, we'll let them do so—you can sell out and go to work for somebody else" is an injustice so harsh that the farmers, East, South, and West, need only to understand it to reject it at once and forever. If, in addition to the natural advantage of the cheap and fertile lands of Manitoba, the Canadian government gave a bounty of 25 cents a bushel on all the wheat there produced, it is easy to foresee what would soon become of the wheat raisers of the Dakotas and Minnesota. Yet, if the argument is a sound one that whatever foreigners can, by subsidy or otherwise, do more cheaply than we can, they ought to be allowed to do it, who will gainsay the shipowner or seaman who declares: "Here I am, unprotected in my ocean trade. Why should the farmer be protected? If Canada can raise cheaper wheat for New York and New England, pull down the tariff and let her do so. What right have you to deny protection to me, and at the same time forbid me to go with my ship for my wheat to British Columbia if I can get it cheaper there, or to Nova Scotia for my potatoes, or to Argentina for my beef, or wool, or hides?"

And what answer is there, truly? Is protection justifiable that protects some only, and not all?

THE HOME MARKET OF THE SHIPYARDS.

Finally, the passage of the shipping bill will benefit the farmers not only in the ways already outlined—not only by providing improved transportation facilities for our agricultural products and increasing their sales in foreign markets—not only by developing a strong naval reserve of auxiliary ships and American seamen to reinforce the regular Navy in time of war—but also in creating a new and great manufacturing industry in America and thereby a new home market for the farmers' meat and dairy products, breadstuffs, and provisions.

Ocean shipbuilding is a manufacturing industry now of small proportions in the United States. There are all told now only three steamers under construction in the entire country for the overseas trade—three ships, of a total tonnage of about 20,000. British shipyards are now building for ocean trade about 1,400,000 tons of shipping, or 70 tons for every ton in hand in American shipyards. Probably three or four hundred thousand tons of this British construction represent ships intended for the carrying trade of the United States—for British vessels now convey about 60 per cent of our entire sea-borne commerce. If instead of a paltry 20,000 tons, three or four hundred thousand tons of ocean shipping were now being constructed in America, thousands of skilled American shipyard mechanics, now idle or working at any kind of unskilled labor for the lowest wages, would be steadily employed in their rightful trades at high wages, and would therefore be able to buy more food and better food for themselves and their families, and to buy and wear better clothing.

A SHIP ALMOST ALL LABOR.

Nor would this be all. Only a part of the work of building a ship is performed in the shipyard on the coast. That work is begun when the ore to make the steel for her plates and beams is dug out of the ground on Lake Superior or the trees for her timbers are felled in the forests of Michigan or Oregon or Mississippi. In every one of the many processes of manufacture from the mine and the forest to the shipyard gate increased employment is given to American workmen of one trade or another, who depend for their food and clothing on the product of American farms. And all the various appliances that enter into the equipment of an ocean ship and are manufactured outside the shipyard—the anchors, chain cables, forgings, wire rope and hempen cordage, windlasses, steam pumps, winches, valves of many kinds, auxiliary engines, engine-room supplies—give work for more American labor, often far in the interior, for many of these things are manufactured in the inland States near the Great Lakes, a thousand miles from the ocean.

All this provides a new and increased home market for American farmers. The workman in the British shipyard receives about one-half of the American wage rate. He can not and does not buy as much food and clothing, and all of the clothing and most of the food a British shipyard workman consumes now come from other countries than America—his bread chiefly from India and Russia and the little meat he manages to purchase from Australia or the Argentina.

ONE AMERICAN WORTH SIX FOREIGNERS.

But every American shipyard workman, you may be very sure, eats none but American bread and meat, and a great deal of it, and wears only American clothing of American cotton and wool. It is the accepted estimate, and a reasonable one, based on these facts, that one workman in an American shipyard is worth as much as a consumer of American farm products as six workmen in a British shipyard. Therefore, considering only the shipyard workmen, the building of three or four hundred thousand tons of ships in America means six times as great a market for the products of American farmers as the building of an equal tonnage in Great Britain. Including the many men employed outside the shipyards in the preparation of American materials and equipment for these American ships, it is safe to say that it is ten times as advantageous to American farmers to have our ocean shipbuilding done in the United States as it is to have it done in Europe.

NOT "SUBSIDIZING THE STEEL TRUST."

And right here it is well to characterize as it deserves the assertion of foreign shipowners, and of others in this country opposed to national aid to the merchant marine, that subventions to American shipping would simply be "subsidizing the steel trust."

This assertion is not true. Every material of every kind required for the construction, equipment, or repair of American vessels for overseas trade is on the tariff free list, and can be imported free of duty if shipbuilders so desire. Under this law all the materials for the construction of a large steel ship have been imported without a cent of duty, and the builders who did this testify that there is no difficulty in the process so far as the tariff law and its administration is concerned.

But the great shipbuilders of the country have testified recently before the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries that steel materials now cost practically no more in this country than if imported free of duty. And these shipbuilders have said, moreover, that the higher cost of American ships was really due, not at all to the materials, which are a minor factor anyway, but to the fact that American shipyard wages are almost twice as high as British wages—and the shipyard labor represents about two-thirds of the price of the finished ships.

These American shipbuilders have also testified that if they were enabled, by national aid to American steamship lines, to construct many ships, to keep their yards constantly at work, and to secure all the economies of full production, they could eventually build ships at as low a cost as any in the world. And they point for proof of their statement to what has already been done by American steel bridge and locomotive builders, who construct many more bridges and locomotives than Great Britain does, and by standardizing their product and employing their plants to full capacity, have been able to pay high American wages and yet to produce bridges and locomotives of the lowest cost.

"Give us the same protection and encouragement you give other industries," say the shipbuilders and owners to Congress and the people, "and we can promise you the same results." Is this not worth trying, at any rate, in the cautious and moderate way proposed in the bill of the Merchant Marine Commission?

THE SHIPPING BILL IN A NUTSHELL.

This measure is thus summarized in a nutshell: Senate bill 529, framed by the President's Merchant Marine Commission and passed February 14, 1906, by the Senate, provides for—

1. A volunteer naval reserve of 10,000 officers and men of the merchant marine and fisheries, trained in gunnery, etc., subject to the call of the President in war, and receiving retainer bounties, as 33,500 British naval-reserve men do.

2. Subventions at the rate of $5 a gross ton a year to all cargo vessels in the foreign trade of the United States, and to craft of the deep-sea fisheries, and $6.50 a ton to vessels engaged in our Philippine commerce—the Philippine coastwise law being postponed till 1909. But these cargo vessels in order to receive subventions must be held at the disposal of the Government in war, must convey the mails free of charge, be seaworthy and efficient, carry a certain proportion of Americans and naval-reserve men in their crews, and make all ordinary repairs in the United States. Ships lose their subventions if they leave our trade for that of foreign countries, or if, like the Standard Oil craft, they are engaged exclusively as common carriers.

3. Subventions to new mail lines from the Atlantic coast to Brazil, Argentina, and South Africa; from the South Atlantic coast to Cuba; from the Gulf coast to Cuba, Brazil, Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama; from the Pacific coast via Hawaii to Japan, China, and the Philippines, and to Mexico, Central America, and the Isthmus of Panama, and from the North Pacific coast direct to Japan, China, and the Philippines, with increased compensation to one existing contract line from the Pacific coast via Hawaii and Samoa to Australasia.

All ships receiving subventions must be already American by register or American built, thus excluding the foreign-built fleet of the Atlantic steamship combination. Not one dollar is given to fast passenger and mail lines to Europe. Ships constructed for foreign commerce to receive these subventions can, under the Dingley tariff, be built, equipped, and repaired of materials imported free of duty.

The maximum annual cost of the proposed mail subventions will be about $3,000,000; of the other subventions and retainers to the naval reserve, from $1,550,000 in 1907 to $5,750,000 in 1916. If tonnage taxes are increased, as originally proposed, the legislation will cost nothing the first year, but turn $616,000 into the Treasury, and the annual average net cost for ten years, with the building of new ships, will be $4,625,000.

Great Britain next year will pay $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 in shipping subsidies; France, $8,000,000; Italy, $3,000,000, and Japan, about $4,000,000.

Two years ago the Republican national platform, on which Theodore Roosevelt was elected President, declared:

> While every other industry has prospered under the fostering aid of Republican legislation, American shipping engaged in foreign trade, in competition with the low cost of construction, low wages, and heavy subsidies of foreign governments, has not for many years received from the Government of the United States adequate encouragement of any kind. We therefore favor legislation which will encourage and build up the American merchant marine, and we cordially approve the legislation of the last Congress, which created the Merchant Marine Commission to investigate and report upon this subject.

A very great majority of the farmers of the United States read this platform, approved it, and voted for the President and other candidates of the party which thereby solemnly pledged its word to make protection completely triumphant by extending it to American ocean shipping, the one industry exposed to foreign competition not already protected by the Government. American farmers are not less patriotic than other men. They are not less solicitous for the welfare of the entire country. They are not to be frightened from any course they believe to be a just and wise one merely because it may cost something, so long as the object in view is worth the while. The building up of the American merchant marine will benefit every legitimate industry in the Republic, and those mistaken foes of our shipping legislation in this country and its selfish and scheming foes abroad who hope to delude American farmers into opposing a policy which means so much to the prosperity and security of the nation do not know the men whom they endeavor to deceive. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL].

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, on Monday, the 26th instant, the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY again addressed the House, renewing his attack upon the Waltham Watch Company and the other leading watch companies of the country. He made another abortive attempt to prove the existence of a watch trust and that this watch trust was the creature of a protective tariff. He attempted to show that through this alleged trust and tariff the American people were swindled by the importation of American watches at cheaper prices than those obtained in the domestic market. He attempted by such aspersions to at least discredit these companies, reduce their product, and incidentally boom the business of the disaffected dealers, whom he appeared to represent.

The honorable gentleman has had a long time to prepare for this his supreme effort. His lucubrations have extended over weeks since his first address. Rumors of telegrams flying to Europe, letters to jewelers, and extracts from the address to be in western papers have been rife throughout the Capitol. A crushing blow was impending that would shatter the tariff wall around American industries and give the people reduced prices on watches.

Expectancy reached its height when the gentleman rose on Monday night. Surely such Herculean labors must bear fruit. Now the superstructure for which the foundation was laid would be constructed. Facts instead of theories would be adduced; evidence instead of imaginings presented; proof instead of tirade given. It will be observed, however, that many things of great importance in his first presentation were utterly ignored in his second. He made no outcry now against child labor in the watch factories. The Census Bureau disapproved that. He uttered no lamentations over the wages of the employee; the wage of 2¼ to 3 per cent more here than is paid abroad was a conclusive answer. He drops the allegation that the tariff had fostered the watch industry. An increase of 500 per cent in the capital invested from 1870 to 1890 in the watch industry of this country settled that. Why, in Waltham plans are now under way to enlarge that great plant, so that 6,000 operatives instead of 3,500 can find employment.

He glided over our foreign trade, having apparently received new light upon that subject. He was unable to fortify his argument upon the reimportation of American watches at reduced prices, as the Secretary of the Treasury refused him the privilege of determining the question, the Government holding that the watches were not of American manufacture, but foreign goods.

Thus the honorable gentleman was reduced to a few elemental propositions. His colleague, Mr. BOUTELL, in his brilliant speech last evening, demolished most of them, and it would be supererogation to take them up again. I shall allude only to those which time did not permit the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] to fully consider.

The chief of these was the existence of a watch trust in the United States. A fair definition of such a trust, I think, would be the combination of several companies or a monopoly by one company by which competition is stifled, or the control of a business centered in the combination or company itself. I listened intently to the gentleman, who at the outset announced that he would show by incontrovertible evidence that such a trust existed. I saw him, as it were, like a hawk, circling in the air, with his eye upon his prey, invisible, however, in the distant blue; anon, he would apparently rise to his unseen victim, alas, only to descend and rise again, leaving us in ignorance, but shivering with apprehension. Finally, the following colloquy ensued:

> Mr. TIRRELL rose.
> Mr. RAINEY. I can not yield now.
> Mr. TIRRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.
> Mr. RAINEY. Oh, certainly.
> Mr. TIRRELL. Now, the gentleman has repeated many times that there was a watch trust with which the Waltham Watch Company was connected.
> Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I have.
> Mr. TIRRELL. Will the gentleman state where it is, when it was formed, and all of the particulars?
> Mr. RAINEY. I will. I am going to do that. I am going to give him more particulars that he wants, and more particulars than the president of the Waltham Watch Company wants. I have started in this fight for business. I have got the evidence against that gentleman and the rest of them, and I propose to keep up this fight until these watch-trust presidents, every one of them, land in the penitentiary, or until at least I give a court and jury a chance to send them there.

After this pronunciamento we expected the proof to be forthcoming. Surely no Member of this body would dare to make a charge like that without foundation. He would not trifle with the House to have his veracity doubted. He was bound in honor as a public servant in a position of great responsibility to prove the charge. Without proof it was billingsgate—discreditable and contemptible. Yet in the balance of the speech, except occasional flings at what he calls "this infamous trust," there is no evidence presented. The gentleman rested his case upon documents and letters extended in the RECORD. He said: "I have some data and letters I have collected upon the subject of the American watch trust." I have carefully examined these documents. The gentleman sent letters to 200 of the retail watch dealers of the United States. He received replies from 105. There are at least, according to these letters, 22,000 retail dealers in this country; less than one-half of 1 per cent responded. The gentleman appears to have published every letter that afforded him encouragement. The first letter he quotes is a refusal to answer pro or con. I quote from other letters published:

> The proof you are hunting for will be hard to find.
> I understand from information given me that there is a trust.
> It is generally understood there is a combination.
> There is no positive knowledge of the existence of a trust.
> I can not say, from my own knowledge, that a watch trust or combination exists.
> I can not give the information asked for.
> I know nothing of the facts from my own personal knowledge.
> I have been led to regard the companies as a trust or combination.
> We have no positive proof.
> I understand there is a combination called the "Big 4."
> I can not say there is a watch trust.
> In my honest opinion there does exist a watch trust.
> I feel there is a combination in the watch business.
> I am convinced there is a trust.
> I know nothing but hearsay as to a combination.
> We are confidently persuaded that there is a trust.
> According to reports there is a trust.
> I understand there is an agreement.
> There seems to be strong indications of a combination.
> We do believe there does exist a trust.
> We have understood there was a "Big 4" combine.
> I have believed in the existence of a trust.
> There is a watch trust talked of.
> There is a trust. We get our information from the jobbers. Any jobber can give you full information.
> We have no evidence of a trust, but are quite positive that this is the case.
> I have no tangible proof. I could not take an oath as to this matter. Everything points to a combine.
> I do not know of any so-called "trust."
> Certain phases savor largely of trust methods.

A very few of the letters make a positive assertion that there is a watch trust, but present absolutely no proof, it being merely the assertion of the writer, who usually discloses a grievance. Even the few that thus assert there is a trust differ as to the combination including different companies and the reason which leads to their personal opinion about the matter. Such is the character of the evidence in these letters by which the gentleman from Illinois seeks to substantiate his charge. In addition, he files documents of great length prepared by W. J. Johnston, president of the W. J. Johnston Company, of Pittsburg, to which I will call attention later on.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois, as a lawyer, should be conversant with the principles that underlie the introduction of evidence. Does he assert that any one of the letters on which he bases his argument that "this infamous trust," of which the Waltham company is a component part, would be admissible in proof of the fact? Pick out if you can one that is not hearsay or personal opinion. The fact that a small retailer in Montana or Oklahoma says there is a trust is valueless, because you or I or anyone can assert with equal vehemence the same, as the gentleman from Illinois in thunderous tones did, picturing watch-trust presidents on their way to the penitentiary. So the whole superstructure falls to the ground. There is the pitiable spectacle presented of the gentleman from Illinois spreading before the country, to bring discredit upon a prosperous industry, allegations of dishonest dealing and illegal traffic without a scintilla of legal evidence to maintain the same.

In addition to the letters to which I have referred, I call attention to the elaborate communication of W. J. Johnston, of Pittsburg, Pa., which appears in the appendix to Mr. RAINEY'S remarks. It may be he bases his charges of a watch trust in part upon what is therein contained. Therefore it is important to unfold the history of this gentleman in his relations to the Waltham Watch Company, that the motive which actuates him may be disclosed and his credibility as a witness determined. He asserts that years ago there was a combination among the leading watch companies of the country. There was indeed an association organized early in the eighties, but disbanded years before the Sherman antitrust law went into effect. One Dueber, a leading spirit in this onslaught, was an officer in that association. He was dropped for alleged dishonorable conduct, and has since by various suits endeavored to establish an illegality in the business methods of the Waltham company. His suits have been dismissed without a hearing on his own allegations as not constituting a cause of action. This is what Johnston refers to when he speaks of a combination of the four leading companies. He mentions certain companies as being blacklisted, but does not give the cause. Doubtless it is similar to his own blacklist, to which I shall advert directly. He mentions his resignation to the Elgin company and his refusal to carry on business with the Waltham company, maintaining it was due to improper conduct on its part. He asserts that the Keystone company repudiated their agreements, which was the cause of the severance of his business dealings with them. That the direct motive of this gentleman may be ascertained and his reliability as a witness gauged, I submit the following. Judge from it whether credence can be placed in his charges. Briefly stated, this is the history:

The Keystone company refused to deal with him because of the untruthful and unjustifiable manner with which their salesmen were treated and the profane and opprobrious epithets applied to the officers of that company. His discontinuance with the Elgin company appears to be voluntary. When his relations had ceased with both these companies he called upon the agents of the Waltham company and informed them of the facts, and said he supposed that would end his dealings with the Waltham company. He was informed that would make no difference. Thereupon he stated he had agreed to act as the wholesale agent of the Dueber-Hampden watches, and asked if that altered the case. The reply was that the Dueber-Hampden had been so involved in litigation with the Waltham company that their relations with that company were strained, and it could hardly be expected that the Waltham company would do business with him provided he should push the sale of their rival's goods and depress their own. Still no change was made. Orders were filled as usual until a short time after, when the following advertisement of the W. J. Johnston Company appeared in the issue of the Jewelers' Circular, July 5, 1905, occupying in bold headlines a page of that journal. Omitting the immaterial matter, it was as follows:

The W. J. Johnston Company, wholesale agents Dueber Watch Case Manufacturing Company and Hampden Watch Company, makers of the Dueber-Hampden watches.

In the construction of these watches there has been attained the highest degree of science, skill, and art as applied to the making of watch movements and watch cases, resulting in that which all must concede to be the leading American watch.

On the opposite page of this journal appears another advertisement of the company:

High-grade watch movements, made by the Illinois Watch Company, Springfield, Ill., and the Hamilton Watch Company, Lancaster, Pa. Are in more general use and are the most highly esteemed for railroad watches.

They are uniformly satisfactory and their excellence is manifested by the confidence they have gained of the critical watch seller and the men who depend upon accuracy of time in their daily life.

Such advertising is entirely legitimate, but it could hardly be expected that the Waltham company, believing their watches to be the best in the market, would continue an agency which ignored their products and extolled a rival's as the best in the world.

Now, at this very time when this occurred this man Johnston was under great personal obligations to the Waltham company. To purchase a homestead he had borrowed a large sum of money of one of the officers of the Waltham company, which was not liquidated for some months after this date, and he had had also the terms and amount of his credit with the Waltham company largely extended.

Personal transactions like these ought as a rule to be eliminated from public discussion. In this instance we refer to it to show the ingratitude and meanness of this man.

Inasmuch, therefore, as no evidence is found of any trust or restraining of trade in contravention of the laws of the land, I am led to believe that the gentleman from Illinois has argued the matter from certain established business methods which the Waltham, the Elgin, and other companies have adopted. Whenever a reason in his correspondence is given that a trust exists it is substantially one of these: Uniformity of prices and charges; the manufacture of exactly similar lines of goods; the selection of certain jobbers for their lists and in some instances the handling of their goods exclusively by selected dealers. If either one or all of these constitutes a trust, then the whole business of the country that amounts to anything is a trust, and the gentleman must put all the presidents of all the companies in the chain gang.

On analysis, however, it will be found, as was the case in his misconception of foreign trade, that a conservative business caution only is observed in the rules and regulations of trade. The principles underlying them, as a rule, are applicable to all lines of business. Merchants do select their customers, do make uniform prices for the same grade and quality, do blacklist some of their customers. Sales are largely made on credit. These sales are determined by the buyer's rating; these ratings are not by any unchangeable standard. First, there is the moral risk, the buyer's reputation, character, honesty, and square dealing. Second, his business ability, as his success in his line has shown. Third, his financial strength, either his own or the guaranty of others. Fourth, promptness in meeting his obligations. Any one of these may determine his credit. The lack of any one of these, especially the first, puts him upon the blacklist. No display of financial strength alone suffices. Every large merchant has a blacklist. Every scrap of information obtainable affecting the basis of credit of his customers is preserved. The list is constantly changing. If the blacklisted watch dealer could pass a disinterested judgment on his own case, he would know the reason therefor. No merchant will discontinue a customer without cause; usually he will go to the limit of prudence before turning the customer down. It is much easier to lose a customer than to secure a new one. The merchant sells to those only who according to his data it would be reasonably safe to do.

Now as to the uniformity of price in grade and quality. The great shoe companies of Massachusetts are an illustration. W. L. Douglas, the largest manufacturer in the United States, sells his products at a uniform price of $3.50 for a pair of shoes. The Regal Company, the Emerson, the Crawford, the Walk Over sell at the same price. Substantially their shoes are of the same grade and quality. A variation in price would sacrifice the trade in either provided for the same grade and quality their price was higher. They must sell at the same price, for a discriminating buyer selects the same article at the lowest price. The Elgin and Waltham companies produce certain watch movements of equal grade and quality, and of course secure the same price therefor. The Hamilton Watch Company a few years ago reduced their price. The other companies making the same grade and quality at once reduced theirs. They had to or lose their business. The gentleman calls the Hamilton an independent company. But independent or regular, all obey an economic business principle.

It is a question, then, of preference in movements and not cost, so for the same reason we buy a Douglas, a Regal, a Crawford, or an Emerson shoe. If, now, it is argued there is a trust because, for example, the number of jobbers is limited, the charge is applicable, following the same illustration, to the great shoe factories of the country. Their sales are confined to their own stores, or to selected dealers. The concentration of business and the facility in handling goods determines their policy. The larger the business the more concentration is inevitable. The multiplication of jobbers would frequently cut off all profit, making the trade of each too small to handle the goods.

But why, Mr. Chairman, spend further time in stating business truths? The only justification is the utter incapacity of some of our Democratic friends to understand methods of business which it would seem they ought to learn by intuition, because these methods, absolutely honest and necessary, appear to them to be a trust bogey stalking abroad throughout the land.

Years ago I was a representative in the legislature of Massachusetts. At that time Waltham was represented by a Democrat, and had been for several years. Business was depressed. The Waltham Watch Company had had a checkered career. It was a struggle to place its goods, with only partial success. It, apparently, could not meet foreign competition; the country was flooded with Swiss-made watches, manufactured by low-priced labor. The population of the city was small, with no indication of an increase. With the imposition of tariff duties a miraculous change occurred. The company increased its capacity by leaps and bounds. The city doubled and trebled in population. Its employees likewise prospered, and New England homes sprang up on every hand. Its citizenship became among the most intelligent and progressive in the Commonwealth. Each for all and all for each was the motto of their business world. Fair and just treatment, adequate wages, and justice in business dealings made a contented people. Such is the history of this country under the protection afforded by a Republican policy. Twenty-six thousand operatives in our cotton mills in Massachusetts have just had an increase in their wages of 14 per cent and 10,000 in the woolen mills of Lawrence an increase of 10 per cent. These object lessons no sophistry or theory or misrepresentation can successfully combat. They will keep the country with Republican tenets controlling in the years to come, even as Waltham, appreciating the situation, has for years rolled up at each national election an overwhelming majority for the Republican party.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to make a new speech. I do not expect to improve upon the able discussion that has been had in this House during this session of Congress. If I may by any possibility suggest some new phases of a very old topic, I should be amply repaid for any effort that I may make. The tariff question in this country is an old one, and it is a political question, and all efforts to take it out of the domain of politics have failed, and always will fail.

George Washington made the first speech that ever was made in the United States, that we have any account of, in favor of a protective tariff. He made it by signing the second bill ever passed by a United States Congress, and which was a protective bill, and so distinctly described in the title. He was followed by his successors in the Presidential office down to and including Madison and subsequently by Mr. Monroe and Jackson. In those days the so-called "Democratic party," or, rather, the party out of which the present Democracy sprung, were all protective-tariff men, and their great leaders were protectionists, and continued so until, by the change of industrial conditions in this country, Mr. Calhoun and others went over to the free-trade idea, and the Democratic party has been permeated by that infection from that day to this. All efforts to extricate the tariff question from party politics have failed. We tried the experiment in 1883 of a tariff commission, and we found at last we were at the same old controversy and political discussion on the questions involved. And so to-day we may say that the Republican party, as such, is a protective-tariff party, and the Democratic party is a free-trade party in spots, a revisionist party in spots, and a party without any idea upon the question in many other spots, and those spots are capable of transformation from one color to another with the rapidity of change that is suggested by the coloring of a certain specimen of the animal kingdom.

I will not attempt on this occasion to go over the arguments in favor of a protective tariff.

I want to start with this proposition. The real question that is coming before the American people this year is not to be a repudiation of the general doctrine of the Republican party and a substitution of the general doctrine of the Democratic party, but it is to be a sort of attack on the outworks of protection in the form of an argument or suggestion in favor of revision of the tariff. My argument, if it is worth anything, will be an argument in opposition to all interference with the tariff at the present time. I am not ashamed of the application of the term "stand-patter" to me. I am exactly that sort of an individual on the subject of the tariff. I shall change only when it can be shown to me that harm to the country comes from the present law, and that a change will benefit the country. Then, in that case, I will agree to such changes as the friends of protection may agree upon.

Now, that does not involve—and I beg the attention of any gentleman who is here to-night to the proposition I make—the fact that a Member of Congress, or a member of the Republican party, stands for no interference at this time with the present condition of the tariff, by no sort of means is a suggestion that we defend every item in the schedules of the present existing Dingley tariff.

The Dingley tariff was made in 1897. It will soon be 10 years of age. There have been mighty changes going on in the industrial system of our country, mighty revolutions in some manufacturing industries of the country, and so it is fair to say that every man hesitates to announce that if he were again engaged in the making of the Dingley tariff schedules that he would put into every one of them exactly the same words and figures that are now in said law. That is not the question involved in this year's discussion. There are many items in the schedules which wise men would differ about, and all men would perhaps say should be changed. But if we enter upon the general proposition of a general revision of the tariff, we are up against a proposition which might bring disaster and ruin to the activities of the times and the whole business interests of the country, so far as our industrial and commercial interests go. To enter upon such a course now would halt the business of the country and paralyze the present prosperity.

While I am on that subject I want to answer the argument made the other night by the gentleman from North Carolina, who seemed to be delighted, absolutely delighted, with the thought that had come to him, that the Republican party claimed that the disaster which came to us in 1893 and some time along before the passage of the Wilson tariff law. There is no stronger argument drawn from the history of American politics upon the question of the tariff than grew out of that very fact that the gentleman seemed so delighted to have an opportunity to refer to. The fact about it was this: The coming into office of Mr. Cleveland, with a Democratic House and a Democratic Senate, which took place in November, 1892, forecast to the people of this country that we were to have a revision of the tariff. It forecast to this country that there was to be a revision downward, toward the position of the Democratic party of a tariff for revenue only. Mr. Cleveland had been elected on a platform that had been forced into the report of the committee of his convention that nominated him from a minority of the committee on resolutions; and the cardinal idea of that platform was that "all forms"—they used that term for the first time—"all forms of protection is a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few." So when it was found that Mr. Cleveland, again at the head of a great and militant party of this country, was backed by a Congress elected upon a platform of that character, the whole country took fright, and the disaster that came upon us in later years was simply the full coming of a period, an epoch, that had been foretold by the election of Cleveland himself.

It did not need the action of the Congress; it did not need the declaration of the body here; it was enough to know that a party had come into power backed with a declaration in favor of substantial free trade, and the whole country became convinced that ruin pursued us. Let me put this proposition to any intelligent man here: Suppose you are a manufacturer of something that is sold in the market, sold in the various States in the Union. I care not whether it be textile fabrics, whether it be manufactures of steel or manufactures of wood or manufactures of anything; suppose you are manufacturing now on a large scale, and conditions are as at present, with the Republican party in power in this House, in power in the Senate, and in power at the White House, and there comes out from that source or sources a public declaration that in the coming session of the Fifty-ninth Congress we will revise the statutes in the direction of a lower tariff. Suppose that could take place, and you believed it to be true, what would you do from now until then? Would you make anything? If you wanted raw material, would you buy it? If you wanted to buy the commodity that you wanted to sell, you being a retailer, would you go to the wholesaler and make with him a contract for future delivery, or would you stand still, as this country stood still from the very moment the clock struck and Cleveland was elected?

There is nothing strange about this. It was the natural and inevitable result of a declaration by the Democratic party that they would destroy the protective tariff. It spread like wildfire throughout the country. It drove to cover every business man and paralyzed every growing industry. It was the inevitable result, and the only importance that attaches to the proposition now is the fact that a declaration to-day of a purpose and intent on the part of the dominant party of the country to enter upon a systematic revision of the tariff would result in exactly the same overthrow of business and the same unfortunate stampede to cover of every industrial institution of the country. Why not? The very lifeblood of our business organization is hinged upon this system of free trade or tariff, and the necessary, natural, and inevitable consequence of a declaration of purpose on the part of a power sufficient to execute the threat to interfere is quite sufficient to overthrow prosperity and destroy business. So much for that. Therefore and necessarily it is wholly unimportant whether the Wilson bill had been passed or not, whether it had been introduced or not. It is enough to say, and every intelligent and every honest man knows it to be true, that instantly upon the declaration of the election of Cleveland and a Democratic Congress the trouble began, and the trouble never ended until confidence was restored by the election of William McKinley to be President.

It was not 12 o'clock on the day following his election that the steel operators, and among others the Oliver Chilled Plow Manufacturing Company leading in the movement, cut the price of wages of labor in Pittsburg; and from that time forward the destructive influences of the election—not the action, my friend from North Carolina, but the election of an organized body of tariff destroyers, a representative body of men following the leadership of Grover Cleveland—destroyed the industries of this country; and you gentleman did it just as successfully before you had passed the Wilson bill as you did it by the passage of the Wilson bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, my opposition to interference with the tariff is that we are living to-day in the greatest prosperity this country has ever seen, and I think I am willing to repeat the language of our protective-tariff President by saying that not only is it the most prosperous that this country has ever seen, but, examined from the standpoint of employment of labor, the reward of industry, the market for our productions at home and abroad, and all that goes to make up wealth and greatness in the country, we are living in the most prosperous time that any country ever saw in all history.

There is published in this city of Washington a daily newspaper. It makes its appearance three hundred and sixty-five days every year. Nominally it is an independent paper, without partisan bias. It is a paper conducted with unusual ability. It is a newspaper of far-reaching activity and enterprise. There is no Democratic newspaper on this continent that is as thoroughly Democratic in all its beliefs and opinions and utterances as the Washington Post of to-day; but it is an independent newspaper, and every once in a while it tells the straightforward, undisguised truth about party politics and party purposes. I do not say that it ever tells anything that is not straightforward, but sometimes it argues in such a way that I suspect the politics of the writer of the arguments. But I hold in my hand its editorial of yesterday morning, which I propose to incorporate in my remarks. It is an able and truthful statement of the prosperity of this country, covering every possible branch of the industrial situation, and covering every possible avenue that goes to make a people rich and great and strong and prosperous; and it is the declaration of that great newspaper which is published here in the city of Washington, overlooking the entire world, observing with the keen eyes of a thorough newspaper man. For its proprietor is one of the greatest newspaper men in the United States; a man who knows how to make a fortune out of a newspaper in Ohio, and who knows how to conduct a newspaper in Washington to the very greatest possible ultimate success of a newspaper. And here is his statement:

INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE.

Business conditions and prospects, in the closing days of the fiscal year, are remarkably good, and records are being smashed in several directions. The import and export commerce of the United States for the year just closing is far ahead of any previous year. The imports will reach about $1,225,000,000, and the exports $1,786,000,000, a total of $3,000,000,000. The effect of the meat scandal upon exports of food stuffs has not yet made itself felt, the exports of food stuffs in May having been larger than during last year. The increase of exports of manufactures is about $50,000,000 this year. This, while gratifying, also emphasizes the fact that the principal increase in exports was in agricultural products. Of the increased imports, nearly 20 per cent, or $23,000,000, consisted of luxuries.

The iron and steel industries are running at top notch. Orders for steel rails for 1907 delivery received during the past week aggregate 300,000 tons, and contracts were made for about 50,000 for delivery during 1906. The steel companies have accordingly placed large orders for pig iron, although the highest price of the year was reached last week. The output of pig iron for 1906 is expected to reach 25,000,000 tons. On account of unfavorable weather, the output in May was less than the demand.

The largest dry goods business ever transacted was reported last week, and this in the face of a higher level of prices. The demand for tin plate is so heavy that the largest manufacturers have decided to run through the summer instead of taking the usual holiday. Shoe manufacturers are doing the biggest business in their history. Reports from other special lines of industry are to the effect that business is better than ever.

In spite of efforts in Wall street to circulate reports of poor corn and oats prospects, the outlook for crops of all kinds is good. The wheat crop is expected to reach 713,000,000 bushels, nearly as great as the enormous crop of 1901. Somewhat unfavorable reports of the prospects of the yield of oats and corn have been discounted since by better weather conditions, and the outlook now is for a good yield of both staples. Cotton is making steady progress toward a good crop, in spite of excessive rain in Georgia.

The money market is easy, partly on account of the deferred call for funds with which to move crops in the South and West, and partly on account of light speculation. Railroad shares advanced to a point within $4 of the highest mark on record. Announcement was made of heavy dividend and interest payments in July, many new corporations entering the list of dividend payers. The dividend and interest payments scheduled for next month aggregate $152,594,266, an increase of $6,985,424 over July, 1905. Of these sums, the railroads will pay $36,837,000 in dividends and $66,546,000 in interest, and industrial corporations will pay $28,041,000 in dividends and $9,163,000 in interest. Banks and trust companies will pay $2,500,000 in dividends.

I quote from a recent magazine article by Mr. James Creelman in Pearson's Magazine for July:

NOT THE STATISTICS OF DESPAIR.

Glance at these figures and see whether any gospel of despair can be built upon them:

Since 1870 the population of the country has a little more than doubled. In the same period the total wealth of the nation has increased from $30,068,518,000 to nearly $100,000,000,000, and the public debt has been reduced from $2,331,169,956 to $989,866,772. The national debt of the United States is $11.91 per capita, as against $92.59 per capita in Great Britain and $15 per capita in France. The total money in circulation in this country has grown from $675,000,000 in 1870 to more than $2,600,000,000 to-day. It represents a per capita money circulation of $31.73, as against a per capita of $18.65 in Great Britain, $19.73 in Germany, $17.85 in Canada, $18.46 in Holland, $9.75 in Italy, and $3.36 in Japan.

In the thirty years stretching between 1870 and 1900 the number of manufacturing establishments in the United States more than doubled, and the value of their products increased from $4,232,325,442 to $13,010,036,514, a growth in thirty years of more than 300 per cent.

In that thirty years the average number of industrial wage-earners increased from 2,053,996 to 5,314,539; in other words, more than two and a half times as many men engaged in manufacturing pursuits—and the total of industrial wages paid out increased from $775,584,343 to $2,327,295,545, an aggregate growth of about 300 per cent in industrial wages.

Eighty years ago three-quarters of the population of the United States were engaged in agriculture. To-day only about a third of the population is occupied in farming. Yet so enormously has the productive power of the individual farmer increased that it is only a few months since the Secretary of Agriculture was able to write to President Roosevelt this stirring statement:

"If the farmers' economic position in the United States is to be condensed to a short paragraph, it may be said that their farms produced this year wealth valued at $6,415,000,000; that farm products are yearly exported with a port value of $875,000,000; that farmers have reversed an adverse international balance of trade, and have been building up one favorable to this country by sending to foreign nations a surplus which in sixteen years has aggregated $12,000,000,000, leaving an apparent net balance of trade during that time amounting to $5,092,000,000 after an adverse balance against manufactures and other products not agricultural, amounting to $543,000,000, has been offset.

"The manufacturing industries that depend upon farm products for raw materials employed 2,154,000 persons in 1900 and used a capital of $4,132,000,000.

"Within a decade farmers have become prominent as bankers and as money lenders throughout large areas; and during the past five years prosperous conditions and the better-directed efforts of the farmers themselves have increased the value of their farms 33.5 per cent, or an amount approximately equal to $6,131,000,000."

Here are frank and truthful statements, and it is enough for my purpose this evening to say that this editorial leaves nothing to wish for in the United States to-day. We have a larger export trade than ever before, larger than ever known or dreamed of before. And let me put some questions to gentlemen who doubtless will follow me on the Democratic side of this House. What is your criticism of conditions at home? What do you say about the employment of labor? To-day I was told that a Democratic Member on this floor stated without hesitation in a private conversation that a hundred thousand men were to-day wanted in half a dozen of the Southern States, and that there was suffering there for the want of that number of men to do the work—no suffering for labor. To-day it is said 25,000 men are called for to harvest the golden wheat crop of that magnificent agricultural State of Kansas, and they are sending in every direction and paying fabulous prices for help in their harvest.

The Democrat says that is true, that is all right, that there is a great demand for labor, high prices being paid for labor, but he points to the enormously high prices that he says the laboring man has to pay to live. Well, I do not believe there is a laboring man in this country, who can speak any language, who would not prefer his wages of to-day, coupled with his expenditure for living of to-day, as compared with the condition from 1892 to 1897. That is the real test, and let somebody tell me what is wrong now with our industrial system at home. Why should we enter upon a revision of the tariff for the purpose of bettering our domestic condition? Do you want higher wages for the laboring man? Do you want greater employment? Do you want a better market? What is it you do want? Tell the people of the country, or cease your clamor upon this question.

Mr. SMYSER. They want the offices. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. My friend says they want the offices. Well, that is a disease not peculiarly confined to the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Now, is it our foreign trade that you want to improve? We are selling more commodities abroad now than we ever sold in all our history. I shall put into my remarks some figures. I am not going to stop now to go into figures to any very considerable extent, but with the permission of the committee I shall decorate my speech with some figures, to show that the balance of trade in our favor is running mountain high, and I shall have something now to say directly about that subject of the balance of trade, because it is the most important factor in our nation's prosperity.

But you say, "Why, you are selling abroad cheaper than you sell at home." I hold in my hand a telegram sent by the Associated Press from London, and published in the Washington Post of this morning, and I want to state to you my proposition in regard to when a tariff is too high and when a tariff is too low and when a tariff is just right. A tariff is too high when it prevents any possibility of competition to keep the American production in a fair position with relation to the wages and to the cost of the product. Whenever there comes into this country a considerable quantity of a commodity of ordinary use in the community from a foreign country, a production that we produce here, that we have raw material to make and have labor to make it, and have a market to sell it in, the tariff is too low.

That is my suggestion, and I take that position in the interest of American markets, of American labor, and American capital. [Applause on the Republican side.] Last year there was imported into this country somewhere in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 worth of steel and iron productions. Some of that was, perhaps, articles that we do not manufacture. Whether it is or not I do not know, but it is enough for me to know that there came into our markets and was sold in this country a product of European labor that was worth in the neighborhood of $30,000,000 of American money, and when I say that I say that upon the question of this product of human endeavor our tariff is not too high. That is my test, and I believe it is a good one.

I hold in my hand a dispatch from the Associated Press from London, dated yesterday. It says:

AMERICA BUYING ENGLISH STEEL.

LONDON, June 26, 1906.

English works report the existence of a large inquiry for steel for America. Fully 10,000 tons were sold last week for quick dispatch to America at a price equal to $24.50 f. o. b. Orders totaling about 50,000 tons are also on the market.

Mr. WATSON. Is that steel rails?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It says steel. I do not care, for the purposes of this argument, what it is, but it is steel and the manufactures of steel. When that fact exists I say that the tariff on that commodity is not too high.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must hasten along. My objection to entering on this subject in a political campaign, such as we are to have, is that there would be no consensus of judgment or opinion as to what ought to be done with the tariff if we entered on the work of revision. We have in this House now, and we have in the editorial representatives about this Capitol, a good many men—able men, bright, clear-headed men, representative men of the industries of their States—who favor revision of the tariff. It has got to be a kind of a song that is sung. We hear it echoing from the plains of Iowa, where self-seeking politicians are seeking to rise into power upon a mere ill-defined proposition that no man apparently yet understands. If you would address a letter to every Representative here, Democrat or Republican, and every newspaper writer that writes editorials in this city, and to every editorial writer in the United States, and ask them for the list of articles of the tariff that, in their judgment, ought to be changed, ought to be lowered or raised, and you could get an answer from every one of them stating their honest convictions, the music that surrounded the Tower of Babel would be a plain song of harmony flowing along the gentle lines of equality as compared with the babel and confusion that would come up. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not a fact that the majority of all the Republicans in Iowa have declared for Governor Cummins for governor for reelection for a third term as a tariff-revision candidate? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know that he is to be nominated as a revisionist.

Mr. WATSON. It has been reported in the newspapers of late that he has said nothing this year in regard to the tariff.

Mr. LACEY. He has never mentioned the tariff in his campaign.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I will tell you what he said last fall. He said that all the robberies committed by all the life insurance companies in all time did not equal one-fifth of the robberies inflicted by the Dingley bill in one year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Any man who would say that is unworthy of the confidence of any one American citizen, let alone the majority of people of a great State. [Applause on the Republican side.] Such a man as that is a malicious fabricator and a disgrace to every decent aspiration of American citizenship.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He has been elected governor of Iowa twice by the Republicans, hasn't he?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And he is going to be elected again, and it shows that Iowa is in favor of tariff revision.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not concede the suggestion. When the Republicans of Iowa meet in convention and adopt a platform we can tell more about that. But what they do or do not do will not shake the Republican party off from its moorings. The party is as soundly a protection party to-day as it was under the splendid leadership of Harrison, McKinley, Dingley, and Hanna, who lead in the great battles we have fought and won and the fruits of which victories the people of this country are now reaping in such generous measure.

Let me tell the gentleman, lest he should be too happy—I always like to see him just happy, but not too happy—that Governor Cummins has eschewed the tariff question during the last six weeks in his campaign, and I defy the gentleman to put his hand upon an utterance of his during the last six weeks that by any means sustains the proposition he has made here to-night.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One more question. Does the gentleman believe that Governor Cummins has changed his mind since he made that speech before the Polk County Club last fall?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I don't know anything about the Polk County Club.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the county that Des Moines is in.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I don't know anything about any speech by Governor Cummins, to which my friend refers. "One swallow does not make a summer." Let me finish what I tried to say to the gentleman before. When the Iowa convention, which is to be held on the 1st of August, shall adopt an expression in favor of a revision of the tariff, without qualification, it will be time enough for the gentleman from Missouri to get happy, and not until then. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] It is not very many days since there was a Democratic convention held in the State of Tennessee, a most boisterous and heroic convention. There was a gala time down there, and everybody was happy, and the Democratic goose was elevated very high above that capitol. The convention remained in session four days, and the Democrats of Tennessee had the time of their lives. They passed a whole lot of resolutions, and they talked about everything in God's world, from the beginning of time down to the present time, except the tariff question, and they never said a word about revision, low tariff, or anything else. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman not think now that he took rather a long running jump, when he jumped from Iowa and lit in Nashville? [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I did not run from Iowa. It was the gentleman who ran up to Iowa, and I was trying to run him down among his friends down South. That is what I was after. [Laughter.] I wanted to run the gentleman down to the place where Democracy is in full bloom, to a State where there are more Democratic protectionists than there are Republican revisionists in the State of Iowa. [Applause on the Republican side.] But let me tell the gentleman something else. Don't go as a missionary into any of these northern revisionist States this year. The gentleman has work enough to do nearer home. Go to Alabama, a State that is prospering and growing as a result of the fruits of the protective tariff. Go to Tennessee, go to all the Southern States, and be careful to omit to preach the doctrine of revision of the tariff in the hills and valleys and rich plains of Missouri. If he does, he will get left again as he did a year ago. Now, let me go on. I am using up too much of my time, and I intended to be very solemn and serious to-night.

I want to make a single proposition. I shall fill out the joints of this broken discussion with some figures to which I have referred. The Democratic party is a party of opportunities. It never has hesitated since 1860, when it ought to have gone out of business and stayed out, to adopt any new idea that comes fluttering along. The party had got pretty well established up to 1904 in favor of the doctrine of a low tariff and free and unlimited coinage of silver. If I say anything in my address to-night that is going to be valuable to the student of American politics in this regard it will be along the line I desire to speak upon now for a few minutes. The platform of the Democratic party of 1896 as well as the platform of the party of 1900 was a logical platform—pernicious, but logical. It was possible to carry out that platform if the Democratic party had succeeded in getting into power. It could have had a low tariff and free and unlimited coinage of silver. It could have had money enough to manage to get along upon that proposition, but unfortunately two defeats of the party drove it suddenly over on to new ground. They went out to St. Louis and considered the subject. They ought to have been more courageous. They ought to have stood by their guns and died there, rather than to have made an inglorious retreat to another platform, which I will show was impossible of execution had the party been successful. That was the longest jump that any gentleman has made who is now within the sound of my voice [applause and laughter on the Republican side]—made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] who jumped from a logical proposition of a low tariff and free and unlimited coinage of silver to the absurd and impossible proposition of a low tariff and a gold standard, and I will try to show you why. What is the fundamental and underlying proposition in our commercial predominance to-day? It is simply because we sell to other people more of the productions of the industrial system of the United States than we buy from them. Without that balance of trade this Government would not be a prosperous one. We point with a great deal of pride to the fact that during the Administration of Mr. McKinley and Mr. Roosevelt there has been a greater balance of trade in the aggregate in favor of the United States than in all the previous history of the United States put together. I am going to try to show you now that the platform of Mr. Parker, the Western Union Telegraph platform upon which he ran for President, born at midnight in the city of New York and telegraphed to St. Louis and forced down the throats of my friend from St. Louis and other astonished Democrats, who woke up suddenly and bowed to the dictation of Wall street—I am going to try to show you that it was as much impossible for them to have carried into execution that platform as it would have been for them to have flown in a kite from St. Louis to New York on that occasion.

We have in this country about $2,700,000,000 of gold coin. Underlying everything that is of any value in this country is gold, as I will show you. Other provision may be made and is made for interchange about commodities, silver, bank notes, Treasury notes, other species of money, all of which under Republican administration is of equal value, but underlying every dollar of it and that which makes every dollar of it of equal value is the gold of this country, and as I have said, there is some $2,700,000,000 of all these varieties of money, and between $800,000,000 and $900,000,000 of that money is gold, probably a greater proportion now. I will treat it as $800,000,000 for my purpose. That $800,000,000 is underlying our credit. It holds up to the standard of equality of value every dollar of our money. If that gold should be drawn out of this country, the credit of the country would collapse instantly unless it should be possible to replace that coin. Suppose we should wake up to-morrow and should suddenly learn there had been put into the Treasury of the United States and disseminated in equal proportions as now exists of the money of the country $800,000,000 of paper money, promises of the Government, if you please, and that during the night the $800,000,000 of gold had suddenly disappeared and gone abroad into other hands and no prospect of any gold being returned to supply the place of the coin which had disappeared. There would be a collapse of the business of this country that would be absolutely stupendous and forever irremediable. Where do we get this $800,000,000 of gold? Where does it come from? How do we happen to have it? We have it simply because under the Administrations which have preceded this one and during this Administration thus far we have had the gold standard and the protective tariff, and those two propositions coming together have put the balance of trade in favor of the United States and drawn to this country $800,000,000 of gold and remains and will remain while Republican administration remains. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Every dollar subtracted from that $800,000,000 lessens the substantial character of our credit system. It makes the difference of the balance of trade. I have no time to indicate year by year how the balance of trade, which had been running against us and which ran against us during part of the Cleveland Administration, has grown up and constantly reestablished itself, until to-day it is the great power that is drawing from all the world the gold of the world and bringing it into the United States. Now, what do the Democrats say about that? They say there is nothing strange about that; it is very easy to account for it. All of a sudden we began to mine a terrific quantity of gold, and the argument is made, and it was made by the gentleman from North Carolina, that the claim of the Democrats of 1896, of Mr. Bryan most eloquently and ably from the standpoint of absolutely bad politics, that we wanted more money, and now they say because we have got more money, and they point to the enormous incursion of gold into our circulating medium, they cry out and say "that is exactly what we wanted. We have got it, and prosperity is here." Let me give you a few figures. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I shall put into my remarks the annual production of gold in the United States since 1890 and 1891, and I state now that you will find that the discrepancy, that the tremendous ratio of increase that the Democrats are talking about, is a dream of theirs. There was a large increase, but not anything like the increase as compared with the discovery of California as compared with the population of the country.

I will show you that immediately following, I state it now, that immediately following the discovery of gold in California, and immediately following the delving out of the earth of $800,000,000 of gold which we had between 1848 and 1860, we had the hardest times we ever had in this country in 1857. And I am going to show you something else about that gold. I may as well go to it now. Between 1848 and 1860 how much gold do you think was discovered, not in foreign countries, but dug out of the earth in the United States? How much? Eight hundred million dollars, an amount equal to just about the gold we have in this country to-day. In 1848 we had $150,000,000. We dug out of the earth $800,000,000; that made $950,000,000 of gold that ought to have been in the United States in 1860. We had a low tariff; we had the Walker tariff down to 1857, and then a low tariff. I want you to get that into your minds. It was a period of low tariff. Where did the gold go to? Where was that gold—the $950,000,000 of gold—that we ought to have had in 1860? I do not know; but I do know that in 1860 we only had $200,000,000 in gold in the United States. Answer that question, my Democratic friends. Where had it gone to, and why? Two hundred millions out of nine hundred and fifty millions. Seven hundred and fifty million dollars had fled. Why? Because on every recurring year there had come from the Treasury of the United States the fateful statement that the balance of trade had been against us, and gold had fled. Why was the balance of trade against us? Because, under a low tariff, we were buying our goods from abroad and sending the gold abroad to pay the difference between our accounts current against the foreign trade and their accounts current against us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, do not talk about selling goods abroad cheaper than you do at home. My Democratic friends, get out of the ruts of dead propositions. Get away from playing with trifles and tackle some of the facts of history, and see how you are going to get along with it.

Why did we borrow $262,000,000 under the Cleveland Administration? I care nothing about the question of who was responsible in 1893, 1894, and 1895 for our troubles. They were hard times, for the purpose of this argument. It is enough for me to know that in 1894 we had reached the culmination of the declared policy of the Democratic party to lower the tariff. We had held the threat over the country, and paralyzed the business and protective industries of the country; and then there had come a period when the balance of trade ran heavily against us, and we had to borrow $262,000,000 in gold. This in time of peace and to pay our running expenses. Where had that gold been, and why did it go there? Answer that, my Democratic friends. We had been producing this vast quantity of gold all these years. I will put into my speech the figures of 1880, when we only had $200,000,000 left, and show you how much we ought to have had and how little we did have when we were compelled to borrow $262,000,000 and sell our bonds, redeemable in gold, in the markets of Europe to run the expenses of this Government. It was not recklessness on the part of the Government. It was not bad administration, except this fundamental error on the part of the Cleveland Administration. It was not fraudulent; there were not corrupt men in office. They were men administering a Government upon a false proposition, and that was that you could run a low-tariff proposition and a gold standard. It never can be done.

Now, I have only ten or fifteen minutes left——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take the gentleman's time, but I want to ask him one question. Is not England a free-trade country?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has it not a gold standard?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do you make it out, then, that the two things can not go together?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will take great pleasure in answering the gentleman from Missouri. I have done it often heretofore and I am a little surprised that he should want to have it repeated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like very much to hear some sensible explanation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. England is more nearly a free-trade country than any of the great manufacturing countries of Europe, but she falls very far short of being a free-trade country, nevertheless. England can not feed her people upon the productions from her own food-supplying sources. She must buy and import vast quantities of food stuffs, so that any general system of protective tariff would disturb the peace of England by enhancing the cost to the consumer of food. It is true that England maintains the gold standard, but she does it for the precise reason and by the same means that we do it in this country. That is to say, her tremendous domination of the markets of the world hitherto maintained by her manufacturing system has enabled her to lay tribute, as it were, upon all the countries of Europe and largely of the whole world. In doing so she maintains the balance of trade largely in her favor as against the whole world in the aggregate, and by the same process that, under Republican administration, we have maintained the gold standard in the United States so England maintains the gold standard in her country. But the gentleman from Missouri must bear in mind that while until very recently the British people maintained this gold standard without complaint, a cry of dissatisfaction has gone up all over England; and while it is true, as the gentleman says, that the Balfour government received an overwhelming defeat recently, it is equally true that there was a peculiar and remarkable and startling uprising of the rank and file of the English people in favor of protective tariff. The farmers of England overwhelmingly supported the proposition, but the people of the great cities, fearing lest a general tariff system would increase the cost of living, voted down the proposition and elected the opposition government, but it is not believed that they can long survive the steady incursion of American products and American tradesmen into the markets of Great Britain. We export enormous quantities of food. She imports vast quantities of food. I was told by a gentleman who claimed to know, and, I think, did know, that if there was drawn around the islands of the United Kingdom a cordon of ships which would exclude all breadstuffs and food stuffs from going into England, Scotland, and Ireland for ninety days, there would be suffering and starvation. Therefore England could not put a protective tariff upon food stuffs. She could not build up her farming industry by a tariff on food stuffs, and that is the reason why the farmers of England are crying out as they are. Our farmers under our system of protection are growing richer year by year. The farmers of England are growing poorer year by year. Our duties on the productions of other countries give us the home markets, and our exports are growing daily. Before such object lessons as these, theories go for nothing. The teachings of the schools fail of securing the approval of sensible men in the light of the teachings of experience.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not Balfour and Chamberlain get the worst thrashing that any two statesmen ever got in the world this year on that very proposition?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They did not get as bad a thrashing as my friend did two years ago.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, there is a majority of 353 against them in the House of Commons.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And we have got 116 in this little body of ours.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But 116 is not equal to 353, is it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman must bear in mind that the House of Commons has 700 members—nearly 800 members.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, another question. I understand you maintain this position: That the country that can not raise food stuffs enough to feed its people can not maintain a high protective tariff?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What about Germany, then?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Germany does not have a high protective tariff, and she buys much of her food abroad. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, Germany imported $153,000,000 worth of things to eat from the United States last year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. But Germany could have fed all her people without importing one dollar's worth from the United States, and I challenge the gentleman's figures.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then why did they import it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Because they could get it better and cheaper here than anywhere else. Germany has not in any proper sense a protective tariff at all, except upon the products of her artisans on certain special articles of her industries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but a few moments left me. A good deal of my time has been taken up in that which has amounted to a deflection from the line I had chosen to speak upon.

I challenge Democrats on this floor not to go abroad for suggestions that they can not prove and hurl them across this House without anything to back them up.

We are not legislating for Germany or for England. Take our own country and tell me why it is that whenever the Democratic party is in power the balance of trade runs against us and the gold flees from us. If you want to account for this, let me ask you another question. You say that the gold that was discovered in the Klondike and in South Africa came and flooded this country. Answer me another question. Do not get up and answer it now; answer it when you have thought, because it is a troublesome one.

How much of the gold, now amounting to over $1,000,000,000, or whatever it is, how much of it do you believe, my Democratic friends, would you have had if you had had the administration of this country during the past ten years? How much of the gold of California stayed here? I have shown you how much. I have shown you $750,000,000 of it fled. What was that thing that drove that gold out of the United States, that would not have driven the gold that has accumulated during the past ten years out of this country? You would have made the silver dollar the standard of this country. How can you say that there would have been a dollar of money in circulation of this money that was worth two of your silver dollars? How much more would there be in circulation in this country than the amount to-day circulating in Mexico? Some little gold is going into Mexico because of the change of system of Mexico very recently made. Would not the gold of this country have fled as the gold of China has fled, until within the last few months there was not a gold dollar, nor a gold pound, nor a gold sovereign, or anything else gold circulating in the Chinese Empire? Why not? Because there was a standard of money that was far below the standard gold dollar in value. The answer to it all is met in the fact the balance of trade is not in our favor in this country when you have a low tariff.

I have only a few minutes, perhaps, to speak. Let us see how it has operated.

Between 1848 and 1860, inclusive, the production of gold in the United States amounted to $651,000,000, and of this $651,000,000, $650,000,000 was from California. As to the amount of gold in the United States in 1848, to which was added $651,000,000, there are no satisfactory or reliable statistics, but it is enough for my purpose to say that in 1873, when reliable statistics appear, we had about $135,000,000, all told, of gold in the United States. All the rest had been driven away by the process which I have already stated. It appears that on the 1st of July, 1860, there was $235,000,000 of all kinds of specie money. This included the money in the Treasury and the money in circulation, but no one can tell what the proportion of gold was. So it is probably a fair statement to say that, as I have already stated, on the 1st of July, 1860, the supply of money, which ought to have been $950,000,000, had fallen to $200,000,000. The Treasury statement for June 1, 1906, shows that the gold in the United States, including in this term gold coin in circulation and coin and bullion in the Treasury, amounted to $1,466,921,374, and the general stock of money in the United States of all kinds as $3,057,901,107. Now, let us take the gold production of the world from 1888 to 1904, and let us see how much there is to bolster up the waning fortunes of Democratic politicians upon this topic:

1888	$110,196,900
1889	123,489,200
1890	118,848,700
1891	130,650,000

1892	$146,651,500
1893	157,494,800
1894	181,175,600
1895	198,763,600
1896	202,251,600
1897	236,073,300
1898	286,879,700
1899	306,724,100
1900	254,576,300
1901	260,992,900
1902	296,737,600
1903	325,961,500
1904	346,892,200

Thus it will be seen that the increase was not in such a rapid ratio would justify the claim that the production of gold revolutionized the business conditions of the United States. All the gold of California could not prevent or halt the awful conditions of 1857. The rapidity of their oncoming was lessened, but the storm swept over us and left wrecks of business never to be repaired and swept away private fortunes never to be replaced.

To again advert to this matter of balance of trade, how is it maintained, how is this vast sum of gold retained in the Treasury? That is a most important factor and one well worthy of our most careful consideration. Divide the population of this country into three great classes—first, the farmer; second, the manufacturer, and third, the laborer. For the purposes of my argument this division is sufficient, and covers substantially the whole population. Who eats the production of the American farmer? You may say the farmer himself and his family and laborers. That is true; but who eats the surplus; who buys it? Men who do not produce the article. Who are they? All the people who are not working on the farm, and in the exact ratio of their purchasing activity is the prosperity of the farmer. The farmer can live—that is, he will not starve—if nobody comes near to buy his surplus; but he must have a market for his surplus or he can not improve his farm, he can not educate his children, and he can not keep up with the march of development of his own country. So he must look to the nonproducer to be the buyer, and that nonproducer is the laborer, the capitalist, and the manufacturer. In order that these nonproducing people can have money to buy the product of the farmer, they must have employment, and they get it by the employment of labor in manufacturing industries.

Where does the manufacturer get his money to pay the laborer who works for him? All I have said about the farmer applies to the manufacturer. He must have money and he must get it from the men who do not manufacture like articles with himself, and it follows if the money of the American consumer of manufactured articles is sent to Europe and invested in the products of European labor, there will be by that amount so much less money in the United States to be expended for manufactured articles and farm products. So the money that is sent abroad lessens the amount of money expended in this country, and by that same process the wage-earners are cut down to that extent. And every dollar of foreign trade balances being adjusted and paid in gold, it follows necessarily that the gold of the country is drained to the foreign market, while the production of labor gluts our own market here and hard times ensue. There is no difficulty to work this problem out. It is as easy and as safe and as certain as any problem in mathematics can be. Every time you reduce the grand aggregate of money paid out in this country for labor and products and send it abroad you lessen the amount of gold in the United States—gold, which is the underlying basis of our trade operations, is lessened in quantity and sent abroad to pay the balance of trade against us, and in that way you will soon work out the problem that I have stated as fundamental, that you can not have a low tariff, a tariff for revenue only, and maintain the gold standard in this country. That might as well be abandoned one time as another. It has operated exactly in proof of my assumption from the foundation of the Government, and it will go on as long as inevitable figures operate as a demonstration. [Applause.]

I add a most valuable article which was published in 1904 in the Philadelphia North American:

[North American, October 5, 1904.]

THE GOLD AND THE TARIFF.

At the present moment we have in circulation in this country of money of all kinds about $2,600,000,000. The paper and silver currency rests upon and obtains its value and effectiveness from the store of gold that we possess. The gold in the National Treasury and in circulation in September, 1904, was $841,000,000. Thus there was about $1 of gold for every $3 of general currency. But the gold has another burden to carry and to impart value to—bank credit. The precise figures representing this bank credit are not available, but beyond question they amount upward far into thousands of millions of dollars. To retain in the country the stock of gold is therefore manifestly a matter of the first importance. No well-informed man needs to be told that if the metal should go abroad in large quantities the American people would encounter financial distress and industrial prostration.

If past experience has any lesson for this nation, it is that the one thing that will send gold away in great sums is large reductions of the duties upon imports—in other words, the kind of tariff reformation to which the Democratic party is solemnly pledged.

What is the experience referred to?

In 1846 and in 1852 this same Democratic party, in control of national legislation, put into operation tariffs which went as far as the party dared to go in the direction of outright free trade. The first of these tariffs was enacted almost simultaneously with the discovery of gold in California—the gold that was needed more than any one thing to promote and expand the industrial forces of a nation that had never possessed anything like a sufficient quantity of real money.

If the protective system as the nation knows it now had been at that time in existence, there could be no doubt that all, or nearly all, the gold unearthed in California would have remained here to benefit our own people. But with our ports wide open to European manufactures the country was flooded with European goods which we might have made at home, and practically the entire mass of California gold was hurried across the Atlantic to pay for them.

In the meantime, the American people, instead of employing gold for currency, as they might have done, were compelled to use rag money of such filthiness and variableness of value as men of the present generation can hardly understand. In the meantime, also, the revenues of the Federal Government, deprived of customs duties in sufficient measure, fell so far below the necessary expenditures that the Treasury was obliged to borrow money for which (so low had the national credit fallen) it was compelled to pay 12 per cent.

The inevitable result of all this blundering and folly was that in 1857, with the Democrats still in power, the nation was involved in one of the worst panics recorded in its history—a panic in which private business and public credit were shaken to their foundations.

In a different degree, but in precisely the same manner, the same thing happened during Grover Cleveland's second Administration. In 1892, the year before he came into office, our total exports were $1,016,000,000. In 1895, two years afterwards, with the Wilson tariff in operation, the exports fell to $793,000,000. Thus we sold less material to foreigners, and for what we bought we must pay more gold instead of paying in produce.

Gold began again to flow to Europe in a great stream. In 1895, for the first time in many years, the expenses of the Government again exceeded the income; the public debt was increased from $585,000,000 in 1892 to $847,000,000 in 1896, and before Mr. Cleveland had been in office two years there was a panic and prostration of industry precisely like that which brought misery and ruin to the nation in 1857.

The number is small of persons who can remember the disasters of 1857. Millions of living men know from observation what happened in 1893. The younger men, who have come into adult years since 1893, will do well to study the complete history of that time of destruction and distress, and the causes of the trouble.

It is hard to believe that intelligent Americans who know the facts will consent to make a third experiment along the line of the Democratic theories and in the direction of another exodus of gold, another panic, and another period of business disaster.

The Dingley tariff went into operation in 1897, and in the six years following its adoption we sold to foreign countries of our products $3,614,000,000 worth more than we bought from them. This enormous (and still increasing) balance of trade in our favor, and this alone, keeps the gold here, and adds continually to the dimensions of our stock. There will never be another gold drain from our shores to Europe while we have a good protective tariff; but no man can safely assert, in the light of the facts presented above, that such a tariff as Judge Parker and his friends are pledged to will not leave us without enough gold for the safety of our financial situation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak of the beef-trust proceedings. In general interest these proceedings are of the most importance. They were concerned with obtaining for the people an article of prime necessity at a reasonable price. The proceedings were begun by bill in equity, the object being to have the defendants, Swift & Co., Armour & Co., and a number of corporations, firms, and individuals, restrained by order of the court from continuing their illegal combination.

The following characterization of the means used by the defendants in carrying out and making effective their alleged unlawful practices is found in the Attorney-General's argument in the Supreme Court:

Controlling 60 per cent of the fresh-meat industry in this country, they sit down in their packing houses and counting rooms, and, with the aid of the telegraph and telephone, through the instrumentality of countless agents and attorneys spread throughout the country, clothing their transactions and scattering their misconduct by ciphers and secret codes, lower and raise prices at will, and when lowered or raised fix and maintain absolutely the price of every pound of one of the great necessities of life as it comes to our households.

In the bill it was alleged, in effect, that the defendants by means of an illegal combination were perpetrating fraud on all the people by exercising their power to unduly raise the price of dressed beef; that they were oppressing and grievously injuring the farmer by forcing him to sell his live stock at prices unprofitable to him; by issuing instructions to their agents not to compete in bidding after prices had been unduly bid up at various points and the owners of live stock had been induced to make large shipments to those points, and that independent packers were being forced to the wall by the lowering of prices where competition was keen, the losses there being recouped by arbitrarily raising prices where the field had been conquered.

These statements have never been denied in court by the packers. They refused to file a sworn answer to the bill after the lower court had overruled points of law raised by demurrer and appeal to the Supreme Court on those questions and after an injunction had issued against them in that court. They were represented by able counsel and the Government by the Attorney-General.

Twenty-three days after the argument was concluded the court unanimously sustained the Government's contentions, and the defendants were directed to cease their unlawful practices.

Thereafter it came to the Attorney-General's attention that the mandate of the court was not being obeyed. An investigation was ordered, the evidence collected. It was placed before the Federal grand jury, and after a patient and a fair examination an indictment was presented at Chicago charging Armour & Co., Swift, and a number of individuals and corporations engaged in the packing business with violations of the antitrust law.

Meantime the Bureau of Corporations had been making an investigation, by direction of the House of Representatives, contained in the so-called "Martin resolution," into "the unusually large margins between the price of beef cattle and the selling price of fresh beef." The Commissioner of Corporations made the investigation and a report, which was published. In so doing he was furnished information by packers and was given access to their books, except that no information was given to him as to the existence of rebates, the affairs of the National Packing Company, or the results of the selling and shipping business. He summoned no witnesses by subpœna or otherwise, and at the argument it was admitted that he made no promises of immunity.

The packers, although they plead not guilty, were strangely averse (as they had been in the proceeding by a bill in equity) to any hearing upon the merits. They filed pleas attacking the constitution of the grand jury, the jurisdiction of the court, and demurrers to the indictments, which were severally overruled. Then they filed what have been called "immunity pleas." In other words, they claimed that they had received a pardon by virtue of the provision of law which gave to them all the immunities conferred by the act of 1893, amending the interstate-commerce act, which amendment applied to all witnesses summoned in pursuance of the law under which the proceedings were undertaken.

They contended that although they had not been subjected to testimonial compulsion—that is, brought before the Commissioner by subpœna and placed under oath—and had not furnished any incriminating evidence, and although the Department of Justice had not used any of the evidence collected by the Commissioner of Corporations, yet they acted under compulsion in law, because the Commissioner had been directed to investigate them and had authority, under the foregoing law, to compel them to testify and produce documentary evidence.

The "immunity pleas" were sustained as to the individual packers, and they were discharged. The pleas were overruled as to the defendant corporations on the authority of very recent decisions by the Supreme Court in the Paper Trust and Tobacco Trust cases hereafter noticed.

The Government also brought suits against several packing companies of Kansas City, the Burlington Railroad Company, and two individual defendants for making and accepting rebates. The outcome of the litigation was the imposition of a fine of $15,000 each against the packing and railroad companies and $6,000 and $4,000, together with imprisonment for four and three months, respectively.

THE PAPER TRUST CASE.

This was a bill in equity against the General Paper Company and some two score independent paper manufacturing companies, located in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan, where they manufactured substantially the sole supply of news print and fiber paper for the district west of Chicago and east of the Rocky Mountains. The defendants raised, in the lower court, some very important questions relative to the rights of witnesses under the constitutional provision that "no person * * * shall be compelled * * * to be a witness against himself."

The point and force of the decision of these questions will be stated in the reference to the Tobacco Trust case, next succeeding, for these cases were argued together and the latter contains all the important points decided in this.

The Supreme Court overruled the defendants' contentions. This decision practically disposed of the paper trust's defense, for there was none on the merits, and it submitted without further proceedings. The trust is now dissolved; the benefits of free competition are being received, and it is reported, on reliable authority, that news print and fiber paper are now being supplied to the consumer at the substantial reduction of 30 per cent.

THE TOBACCO TRUST CASES.

These grew out of an investigation by a Federal grand jury, sitting for the southern district of New York, of the American Tobacco Company and the MacAndrews & Forbes Company. Witnesses were summoned to testify to their knowledge of any facts tending to show that these companies were violating the antitrust laws. Subpœnas duces tecum were served upon officers of each company, directing them to produce papers and other documentary evidence belonging to the corporations, and those officers refused. They were adjudged in contempt of court, and they appealed to the Supreme Court. The questions taken to the Supreme Court and decided in favor of the Government were:

First. That a corporation which could not testify, or as a witness produce papers, is not within the terms of the immunity act of 1903, which is in almost the exact language of the immunity act under which the packers claimed immunity.

Second. That a corporation engaged in interstate commerce is not entitled to withhold its books and papers from the scrutiny of the properly authorized officers of the Federal Government, and that the fifth amendment of the Constitution does not grant to such a corporation the right which an individual would have to withhold the same evidence upon the ground that it might tend to incriminate him.

The investigation was again taken up and resulted, on June 18, 1906, in the finding of an indictment against the MacAndrews & Forbes Company and Karl Jungbluth, its president, and against the J. S. Young Company and Howard E. Young, its president, charging them with violating section 1 of the Sherman antitrust law by engaging in a combination in restraint of the trade in licorice paste, that being an indispensable ingredient in the manufacture of plug tobacco and some kinds of smoking tobacco, cigars, and snuff. This trade was restrained in the usual way—that is to say, competition was destroyed, arbitrary prices were fixed, the volume of business was apportioned, and terms of sale and discounts were made uniform. A feature of the combination was that the MacAndrews & Forbes Company, in the division of customers, was allotted the trade with the tobacco manufacturers who were members of the so-called "tobacco trust," while the J. S. Young Company was given the independent trade, the latter company having by its advertisements made special claims for recognition by the independent trade before the date of the combination in question.

This indictment also charged the same defendants with engaging in a conspiracy in restraint of the same trade, and attempting to monopolize that trade (sec. 2 of the act), in and by the acts specified in connection with the charge of engaging in a combination. This case will be brought to trial at the earliest possible moment.

THE DRUG TRUST.

May 9, 1906, suit for an injunction was filed against the drug trust. The principal parties defendant are the Proprietary Association of America, the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, and the National Association of Retail Druggists.

The bill charged, in substance, that these associations, their officers, delegates, and members are all engaged in the business of manufacturing, buying, and selling patent medicines, drugs, and proprietary articles throughout the United States; that they have entered into a conspiracy to arbitrarily fix and regulate the prices at which such articles shall be sold to the consumer, and that they have established rules and regulations to enforce such an unlawful agreement by restricting the purchase and sale of such commodities to those members of the several associations who shall live up to and observe the rules and regulations thus arbitrarily prescribed by the respective associations.

The ultimate object of the alleged conspiracy is to fix the prices which shall be observed by the retail druggists in selling to the consumer the various commodities manufactured by the several members of the Proprietary Association. The plan by which such object is effected is, in brief, as follows:

No retail druggist can obtain goods from a wholesale druggist or the manufacturer of a proprietary medicine unless such retail druggist becomes a member of the National Association of Retail Druggists, and in order to become such member he must agree to observe the established price at which such proprietary medicines shall be sold to the consumer. If he cuts prices, he is blacklisted and is unable to obtain from any manufacturer or any wholesale druggist, who is a member of the association, any of their medicines.

In a case brought by a Philadelphia druggist under the Federal antitrust act the plaintiff obtained a substantial victory. For several months prior to the trial of this case the Department of Justice had been engaged in the investigation of the conspiracy, and the Attorney-General, having reached the conclusion that the combination is one prohibited by the terms of the Sherman antitrust act, has directed the district attorney for the district of Indiana to file this bill. An injunction is prayed prohibiting these associations from acting in concert for the purpose of maintaining prices and the individuals, firms, and corporations who are members of the respective associations from acting together for the purpose of maintaining uniform prices to the consumers throughout the United States.

THE ELEVATOR TRUST.

March 7, 1906, suit was brought against some thirty companies manufacturing passenger elevators for buildings, the bill alleging an illegal combination which had obtained a practical monopoly in the manufacture and sale of elevators.

The Government's case was complete; the defendants have admitted their guilt and have dissolved their combination.

COAL INVESTIGATION.

The Attorney-General has recently appointed special counsel to make a full and complete investigation into the alleged combination of railroads and coal operators in the anthracite and bituminous coal regions, and the investigation is now proceeding. It promises to be one of the most important steps taken by the Government to break up combinations that are hurtful to the consumers of the country. Already astounding revelations have been made, and even before a report has been made reforms are in progress. When final report is submitted to the Attorney-General, if there is shown to be any ground for criminal prosecution, the Government will take active steps.

NOME RETAIL GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

The Government's prosecution of the trusts has extended even to far-away Alaska. Complaint was made that there was a combination known as the "Nome Retail Grocers' Association," which had fixed prices and suppressed competition. The Government took action, won a decree in its favor against the combination, and the Attorney-General is advised that the effect has been very salutary.

HAWAIIAN BEEF TRUST AND LUMBER TRUST.

The Government went to the relief of the citizens of Hawaii, who complained against a meat and a lumber trust, and entered several suits. The mere beginning of the suits resulted in the lowering of prices, although the cases have not been decided.

TERMINAL RAILROAD ASSOCIATION OF ST. LOUIS.

In Missouri suit has been brought against the Terminal Railroad Association of St. Louis, the St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal Railroad Company, the Wiggins Ferry Company, and others, in which it is sought to free interstate traffic from an alleged combination to operate the Eads Bridge and the Merchants' Bridge as a common agency of interstate commerce and to suppress competition between these bridges and the ferries. It is alleged that the defendants are monopolizing the interstate transportation across the Mississippi River and into St. Louis. The Government is prosecuting these cases vigorously.

JACKSONVILLE WHOLESALE GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

In Florida the Government is seeking an injunction against the Jacksonville Wholesale Grocers' Association. Complaint was made by consumers, and the Department has taken up the case with vigor.

THE FERTILIZER TRUST.

A Federal grand jury sitting in Tennessee has returned an indictment against the fertilizer trust, comprising thirty-one corporations and twenty-four individuals. The fifty-five defendants controlled the field in nine Southern States for the sale of fertilizers indispensable to all engaged in raising cotton. Their combination was so effective that the price of different grades was raised on an average of $2.50 a ton. These cases have taxed the resources of the Department to the utmost. The great combinations conduct their business secretly, with the aid of skilled legal advice, and their operations cover an extensive field.

THE SUGAR REBATE CASES.

In New York recently indictments were returned against the American Sugar Refining Company, New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, and several individuals. The charge was made that rebates amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars have been often given to the sugar company to aid it in its fight with the farmers who are conducting the struggling industry of producing sugar from beets. When the sugar trust wanted to overcome the competition of the farmer, wanted to lay such stress upon him that he would give up the contest in despair and dispose of his property to the monopoly, it went to the railroads and borrowed a club with which it clubbed the farmer to death. The grand jury did not complete its investigation, but when it adjourned published a recommendation to its successor that it take up the work.

COAL CARRIERS' CASES.

Proceedings were instituted in 1903 in behalf of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Company and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company. The Chesapeake and Ohio was engaged in the carriage of coal between West Virginia and Newport News, Va., for delivery to the New York, New Haven and Hartford in Connecticut, and the traffic was being moved at less than the published rates, and in such a way as to produce a discrimination in favor of the New Haven road and against others. The Chesapeake and Ohio made a verbal agreement with the New Haven road to sell to the latter 60,000 tons of coal, to be carried to tide water and thence by water to Connecticut, for delivery to the buyer, at $2.75 per ton. The price of the coal at the mines where the Chesapeake and Ohio bought it and the cost of transportation from Newport News to Connecticut aggregated $2.47 per ton, thus leaving to the Chesapeake and Ohio only about 28 cents per ton for carrying the coal from the mines to tide water, while the published tariff for like carriage for private shippers was $1.45 per ton.

The court held that the contracts amounted to undue discrimination and enjoined the Chesapeake and Ohio from continuing the contract. Afterwards the Interstate Commerce Commission requested that the injunction be expanded to command the Chesapeake and Ohio perpetually to observe, in the future, all published rates. From the decision of the trial court an appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court, and February 19, 1906, the latter court held that the injunction should be enlarged by perpetually enjoining the Chesapeake and Ohio from taking less than the rates fixed in its published tariff of freight rates for the carriage of coal.

This is a very important decision. Under it a railroad can not, by choosing to be a dealer, favor one customer over another. The intent of the law is to secure equal rates to all in a like situation, and to destroy favoritism.

UNJUST CLASSIFICATION.

Proceedings were instituted in Ohio in July, 1904, in behalf of the Interstate Commerce Commission against the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railway Company, the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis, the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, the New York Central and Hudson River, and the Baltimore and Ohio.

The court, on November 25, 1905, enjoined the defendants from violating the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to unjust classification of the commodity involved.

DISCRIMINATORY AND UNJUST RATES.

June 17, 1905, a bill in equity was filed in Louisville against the Illinois Central and several other railroads for discrimination and unreasonable rates. This case is still pending.

July 15, 1905, a bill in equity was filed in the northern district of Mississippi against the Mobile and Ohio Railway for the purpose of preventing discrimination in freight rates. This case is still pending.

ACCEPTING REBATES.

An indictment was returned in October, 1905, in the western district of Kentucky against Szorn & Co. for accepting rebates in violation of the Elkins law. The defendants pleaded guilty and were fined $3,075.

October 13, 1905, two indictments were returned in the western district of Kentucky against Charles Wells and Hollis H. Price, charged with conspiring to make false weights and reports of weights of articles of interstate commerce. Price was fined $1,025. The case against Wells was continued.

EVADING PUBLISHED RATES.

November 13, 1905, a petition was filed in the eastern district of Wisconsin against the Milwaukee Refrigerator Transit Company, the Pere Marquette Railway Company, the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company, the Erie Railway, the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company, the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, the Wisconsin Central, the Chicago and Alton, and the Pabst Brewing Company.

It is alleged that the Pabst Brewing Company is a large shipper of beer and the Milwaukee Refrigerator Transit Company is a transportation company owning and operating private cars, to which was given the control of the shipments of the brewing company by contract; that some of the principal stockholders of the brewing company were the controlling owners of the transportation company, and that while the full published rate was paid to the railroads they returned to the transportation company, by way of commission, 12 per cent of the gross freight rates.

The Government claims that this transaction was in effect a device whereby the property was transported for less than the published rates. A demurrer was overruled and, therefore, the Government's legal action sustained. Since then a decree in favor of the Government has been entered, after full argument.

INDICTMENTS FOR RATE CUTTING.

July 1, 1905, indictments were returned in the northern district of Illinois against three officials of the packing house of the Schwarzchild & Sulzberger Company (believed now to be an independent concern, not in the beef trust), charging a conspiracy to obtain freight traffic at less than the published rates.

To these indictments the defendants severally pleaded guilty, and were sentenced to pay fines aggregating $25,000, with which sentence they have complied.

REBATES AND REFUNDING PASSENGER FARES.

December 13, 1905, an indictment was returned in the northern district of Illinois against the Chicago and Alton Railway Company, John N. Fairthorn, and Fred. A. Wann, for giving rebates on dressed meats and packing-house products shipped from Kansas City, Kans., to Chicago and eastern points by the Schwarzchild & Sulzberger Company and for refunding passenger fares paid by the officials of that company for traveling over the Alton road. Special pleas in bar to the indictment were filed, to which the Government interposed demurrers, which were sustained. This case is now pending.

INDICTMENTS FOR REBATING.

December 15, 1905, indictments were returned in the eastern district of Missouri against a number of railroad companies and individuals, charging them with violations of the Elkins law in the demanding and receipt of rebates. Some companies in the beef trust were made defendants in these cases. Several indictments were found and convictions ensued in the cases of several individuals. The United States will ask the court to impose a sentence of imprisonment against the individuals and fines against the corporations.

December 29, 1905, an indictment was returned in the northern district of Illinois against the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway Company, D. Miller, and Claude G. Burnham for giving rebates in violation of the Elkins law.

To this indictment the defendants entered pleas of guilty, and fines aggregating $60,000 were imposed by the court.

Three other important cases in this same category have been brought, one against the Suffolk and Carolina Railway Company, another against the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, and another against the Delaware and Hudson Company for giving rebates, and are now pending.

SUSTAINING THE COLORED MAN'S RIGHTS AND PROTECTING THE COLORED MAN'S LIBERTIES.

Under the present Republican Administration the Government, through the Department of Justice, has taken action in the Federal courts, winning out at last in the United States Supreme Court, which will go further toward protecting the rights and liberties of the colored people in the Southern States than anything that has happened since the civil war.

Complaint was made to the Federal authorities that throughout the South a practice existed under what is known as the "peonage statutes," by which men were held to labor for a debt. In almost all the cases the victims were colored men. Practically they were held in slavery, for means were found to keep them from getting free of debt, and as long as they remained in debt, they were virtually in bondage to their creditors. Investigation of the complaints revealed some most atrocious and heartrending cases of cruelty and practical slavery that almost rivaled the days before the war.

The Government took quick action. The first case which was tried was argued in March, 1905, although prior thereto several hundreds of indictments had been returned. Action on these indictments was suspended awaiting the determination of the case of Clyatt v. The United States, brought under the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution.

The state of peonage, in which many persons were held, consisted in holding a man by compulsion to labor for a master to whom the peon owed a debt. Creditors compelled debtors—usually colored men—to work out their debts. The custom was very prevalent, and had its origin in the United States when the Territory of New Mexico was acquired.

The Government contended that compulsory service of this kind was, in fact, a form of involuntary servitude and therefore forbidden by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which was passed, under the auspices of the Republican party, to give the negro his rights. It was also insisted that the amendment gave Congress the power to enact laws which should punish individuals who, not acting under State authority, attempted, with particular reference to this case, to hold or return persons into a state of peonage. The Supreme Court held that the Government's contentions, which were personally argued by the Attorney-General, were well founded; and, though the particular offenders in this special case escaped because the court held that the record did not contain sufficient evidence to justify their conviction, the effect has been most salutary.

An authoritative exposition of the law was obtained, and no person within the jurisdiction of the United States can be hereafter compelled by individuals to work out a debt as a peon. Following this decision the other indictments were pressed, and the result is that this form of involuntary servitude is being stamped out.

After this decision the Attorney-General personally argued another case involving the interpretation of the same amendment. In this it was found that a number of men had conspired to prevent some colored men, who were at work at a lumber mill, from performing their contract. The colored men were driven away from their work by armed force and intimidation, and these acts of violence were committed against them because of their race. The Government contended that to deprive a man of any measure of his right to work solely for the reason of race prejudice is an interference with the right of freedom guaranteed by the Constitution.

The court decided that the Government could not punish, but undoubtedly the States may punish such intimidation. Two justices of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Day, were of the opinion that the Government ought to punish.

GOVERNMENT HELPS RAILROAD MEN.

One of the most important cases which the Government of the United States, under the Republican administration, has fought successfully in the courts was the case of Johnson, an employee of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, against that company for damages under the safety-appliance law. Johnson fought his case through the lower courts and was getting the worst of it, when his money gave out. An appeal was made to the Government, and the Department of Justice took up the case and carried it to successful issue in favor of Johnson before the Supreme Court of the United States.

The decision set a hard and fast rule in certain cases of personal injury, from which there can be no appeal, and which should operate in the future to enable every railroad man who receives injuries under the peculiar circumstances which prevailed in this case to make an appeal successfully for damages.

This was an action for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff Johnson while engaged in coupling an engine to a dining car. The railway company is an interstate carrier and was alleged to be liable for damages under the safety-appliance law passed by Congress, which provides, in substance, that interstate carriers must equip their cars with automatic couplers which shall couple by impact. The engine and car were each fitted with automatic couplers, but, being of different makes, they failed to couple, and when the plaintiff went between the engine and the car to couple them he received his injuries.

Johnson was unsuccessful in the circuit court, and also in the circuit court of appeals, whereupon he filed a petition for a writ of certiorari in the Supreme Court, which was granted.

Owing to the great importance of the case to railway employees, the Government took an almost unprecedented step and obtained leave to intervene to argue the question relating to the proper construction of the remedial legislation of Congress.

The Government contended that an engine is a car within the meaning of the law, and that the law is not satisfied unless the automatic couplers couple by impact. An amendment to the law has passed since this case arose, making it clear that engines must have automatic couplers. This act, the Government contended, was merely declaratory of the intent of the first act. There was a further question in the case as to what constituted an interstate car, which the Government argued. The defendant contended that the dining car, because it was not en route, but was upon a siding, although ready for use and about to be used, was not an interstate car. The Government, on the other hand, contended that a car regularly employed on interstate journeys does not lose its character because it is temporarily delayed.

The Government's contention received the unanimous approval of the court, and Johnson won his case.

Not content with this, the Government went further, and the Attorney-General issued a letter of instruction to all United States attorneys, in which he said:

It does not appear that any question can now arise as to the proper interpretation of the law, since this decision apparently settles every disputed point.

And the United States attorneys were informed that "the Government is determined upon the strict enforcement of these statutes," and they were instructed to pay particular attention to all cases of their violation brought to their attention by the Interstate Commerce Commission or its inspectors or by other persons.

Later, in the case of The United States v. The Southern Railway Company, the law was still more clearly interpreted and further strengthened. A strong point of this decision was that the exercise of reasonable care or due diligence on the part of the railway company is no defense to an action brought to recover the penalty for violation of the safety-appliance laws of 1893 and 1896.

In both of these decisions it was strongly emphasized that the purpose of the law was to protect the lives and limbs of men, and that it will be so construed by the courts as to accomplish that purpose. What the law plainly requires is the equipment of cars with couplers which will automatically couple with each other, so as to render it unnecessary for men to go between the cars either to couple or uncouple.

These decisions have enabled the Government to obtain an effective enforcement of the law in practically all cases, and have brought about a vast improvement in conditions throughout the country. Since the decision against the Southern Railway Company no case has been contested in the courts. The carriers prefer to confess judgment and pay the penalty in cases of violation rather than to stand the chance of adverse judgment on a trial.

As a result the Interstate Commerce Commission have been able to secure the observance of a rule, practically in operation throughout the country, whereby the different carriers are required to refuse to accept interstate cars in exchange unless the safety appliances are in proper condition.

Another beneficent phase in this case for the railroad men is that the intervention of the Government and the decision of the court is warning to the railroad companies that the Government is looking out for the interests of the employees under this law.

SOME NATIONAL-BANK CASES.

The Government has been very vigilant in enforcing the national banking laws. Under this Administration several important cases have been tried.

In the eastern district of Pennsylvania Henry Lear was indicted, charged with misapplication of the funds of the Doylestown National Bank, and was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. He sued out a writ of error, and the case is now pending.

In Wisconsin Frank G. Bigelow was charged with misapplying the funds of a national bank at Milwaukee, and was sentenced to ten years in the penitentiary.

M. C. Palmer, of New York, was charged with the misapplication of funds of a national bank while acting as its president, and was sentenced to five years at Albany.

The celebrated Cassie Chadwick case in Ohio was prosecuted by the Government, and the defendent was sentenced to a term of ten years in the Ohio penitentiary for conspiracy in the misappropriation of the funds of the Citizens' National Bank of Oberlin, Ohio.

Arthur B. Speer was jointly indicted with Cassie Chadwick and was sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary.

In the northern district of Iowa, W. E. Brown, a national-bank official, was indicted for violation of the national-bank laws. He was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss the tariff in the light of two recent expressions which seem to have taken a permanent place in our political literature. One owes its popularity to the present President of the United States, the other to the late distinguished Senator Hanna. One has a specific, the other a general reference to the tariff revision and reduction.

In my judgment (and I welcome the fact), we are leading up in the coming Congressional and Presidential elections to another great tariff trial to be submitted to the American voters for their decision at the ballot box. I wish to style and state this case, to enter an appearance for the plaintiff, introduce some evidence, and argue the plaintiff's side of the case. I wish to state the case as Square Deal v. Stand Pat. This Square Deal, politically, at least in the form of expression, is the child of President Roosevelt. It is true that of late he has not given much attention to this particular child on the tariff subject, but he may be justly excused because he has been so busy strenuously discharging the duties of stepfather to numerous other Democratic children; but after a while he may be expected to give some attention to this. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is notably the case with the railroad rate regulation child; and there are various other Democratic tendencies of your present President which we all gladly welcome. And I digress for a moment to state a simple truth, that whatever popularity your President has, he has it by virtue of the fact that he has gone over the heads of your leaders and your organization, and has appealed to the great common people and their democratic tendencies. You support these things not because you love Roosevelt, but dread the people.

Stand Pat, the defendant in this case, has a definite, fixed meaning. The stand-pat generals of this great army of stand-patters have had their day in court in this House, and I have picked out from the speeches of three of the ablest of these distinguished generals, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] and the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL and Mr. PALMER], what they have to say on the subject, what they mean by proudly boasting, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] does, and as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has recently done, why they are stand-patters.

Stand pat was coined originally by Senator Hanna to express the bitter and determined opposition against any tariff legislation looking to a change in existing schedules of the Dingley bill. It is the relentless foe of any sort of reduction or revision of the tariff. The reason given for that opposition by Senator Hanna and echoed in this Chamber by every one of the stand-pat generals of the army of stand-patters is that the Dingley law produced the prosperity which the country has enjoyed since its enactment.

By the way of digression I want to say that the application of "army" to the crowd of stand-patters is singularly a proper one, for the army of stand-patters is the most magnificently equipped, the finest-disciplined and the amplest-provisioned army that the world ever saw [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], and it bears the exact relation to the people that every other army bears, namely, the cost of all this falls on the bowed backs of the plain people of the country.

Now, lest I should be accused of stating the cause of the defendant stronger than its advocates have, I wish to briefly read from the speeches delivered in the House by Mr. DALZELL May 24, Mr. LANDIS June 1, and Mr. PALMER June 2.

Mr. DALZELL, with that peculiar adroitness of which he is the master, says:

I have said sufficient to show what were the conditions that existed at the time of the adoption of the Republican national platform. With respect to the policies from which these conditions resulted that platform said, "We promise to continue these policies." That promise still abides with us, and we propose still to abide with it.

Further on, he says:

What constitutes national prosperity? Many things in combination. The magnitude of a nation's commerce, the supremacy of its manufactures, the wealth of its agriculture, coincident with enlarged markets for the consumption of its products at remunerative prices, the general employment of its citizens at an adequate wage, and withal a sound credit and the universal contentment of its people. Neither alone nor in combination did these things exist when the Wilson-Gorman bill was in process of enactment, or subsequent thereto.

All of them have existed since the passage of the Dingley law, did exist when the Republican platform was adopted in 1904, and all of them exist in an enlarged degree to-day. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is not necessary to our contention to claim that these things are wholly the fruits of protection, although they are in large part. Sufficient for us to know that they coexist with protection, and the lesson they teach us is to let well enough alone.

Note the shrewdness of "in large part" and "sufficient for us to know."

But Mr. PALMER, with that bluntness which is characteristic of this singularly able and honest man, said boldly:

Prosperity in "good measure pressed down, shaken together, and running over," came to the country under the Dingley bill.

Further on, he says:

Shall we stand by the doctrine of protection to American labor and American industry, which assures work and wages to our working men and women and prosperity for all our people?

Further on, he says:

The Republican party renews its allegiance to the doctrine of protection. It is the bulwark of our industrial independence and the sure foundation of the prosperity of our people.

Mr. LANDIS says:

I am a Republican. I am an advocate of a high protective tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am what might be known in the nomenclature of the day as a stand-patter [applause], and responsive to the benignant smile of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], I will say that I am one of those who believe in letting well enough alone. I still have faith and confidence in the Dingley law.

Ah, I would say to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that if I were a southerner, I would have faith in the Dingley law, because I would know that it had lifted my section from the slough of despondency and enabled me, both in agriculture and manufacturing, to become a rival boaster of the Yankee. Why, if I were a Democrat, I would have faith in it—the faith of blind fate, if nothing else. [Applause.]

I still have faith in the Dingley law. [Applause.] I have faith in it as a Member of Congress because I see it sending a continuous stream of revenue into the National Treasury, because it has made our people prosperous and happy.

I want it known that I appreciate the present progress and wealth and development and achievement, that I believe that Senator Hanna's advice is still good, and I am willing to let well enough alone.

Now, I wish to affirm with reference to this underlying reason for "stand pat" three propositions: That this statement that protection produced prosperity is, first, false in theory; second, that it is false in fact, and, third, that it is pernicious in its teaching and effect.

The theory that prosperity, general and permanent, can be produced by legislation on any subject is a startling doctrine, not worthy of consideration for a moment by any sincere, thoughtful, well-informed man. That centuries ago was the dogma of despotism; it was doctrine of the divine right of kings that "we make our children happy and prosperous." It has no place in any true economic theory of development of any country, and especially when under such a Constitution and in such a condition as ours.

It may be granted fairly that legislation may promote prosperity, but it never can produce it, and the very gentlemen who now so strenuously talk it ten years ago were the very men that sounded the bugle note all over this Republic on the money question, that you can not make value by law, that you can not create prosperity by legislating an increase in the volume of money regardless of intrinsic value. I was one, though a Democrat, who agreed with that proposition, and I abide in the faith still, and it is as applicable to the tariff as it is to any other phase of legislation. You can not produce prosperity by law any more than you can produce dogs and cats by law. It does not come in that way. It is a great natural, universal process through which prosperity must come. It does not come down from the Government to the people. It does not come from the hands of kings, or courts, or legislatures, or parliaments. No; it comes by the blessing of God in soil, in season, and the industry and intelligence of mankind combined. In this country peculiarly prosperity is a great hybrid, born of the gift of God in soil and season, and of the energy, the industry, the tireless will and intelligence of the American citizens, the greatest the world has ever known, and especially those who till the soil and work the mines and attend the ranches of the country. Prosperity, my countrymen, is a natural product, born of conditions which can not be produced by any party or any government that exists, that has ever existed, or that will ever exist. The truth is, a country, teeming with potent forces and great resources like ours, must and will be prosperous, in spite of who is President and who occupies the legislative halls. The worst you can do as Republicans and the worst you have done is to retard prosperity. You may by legislation divert from its general, universal, and wide avenues part of the prosperity, channelize it and localize it and benefit an individual, a class, or a section. You can do that by protection, as you can by various other forms of legislation, but you can not produce a general, universal, and permanent prosperity by protection, or by any other sort of legislation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURGESS. I yield this time, and then I give notice that I shall not yield further, because in forty-five minutes' time I will be crowded to say what I want to say. Now I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I simply wanted to know right in this connection, if the gentleman could answer, why, under the last two Democratic Administrations in this country, in which the Democratic party had full control of the Government, under a low tariff, neither God nor nature contributed to the prosperity of the American people, and they had no prosperity?

Mr. BURGESS. I can not be diverted from my present line of argument to enter into a discussion of ancient history. That has been done by many gentlemen here, and it was long ago exploded that the adversity which followed the election of Grover Cleveland was produced by anything then done. It grew out of great natural causes, breeding even under Harrison's Administration, and for which his Secretary of the Treasury was preparing before he went out. I guess the gentleman has heard of the plates and knows about the situation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let me go on. I say that the theory that protection produces prosperity is false in fact. That is the real point, and I say that is the point to which no stand-pat gentleman who has issued his proclamation in this House has addressed himself. I defy you to find a single stand-pat speech made in this House which attempts to give the philosophy which connects the alleged effect and cause. It is a bold, bare, brazen assumption from the assertion that you were in power and passed the Dingley law and the country has since been prosperous, that therefore protection produced the prosperity. "The day broke because the cock crew," as Savoyard says. You have attempted to give no facts that by any process of reasoning can constitute links between the Dingley law and your control and the prosperity that has continued in the country during the last ten years. I shall attempt to take the negative and to prove, out of the mouths of three Cabinet officers of the present Administration, that the converse of the proposition is true; that the real sources of our prosperity are in accord with my theory of how it has been and must always be produced. The first document I shall introduce in evidence in proof of that contention is the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, for 1903, in which he sums up what made our country prosperous, what paid the foreign bondholders, what extinguished our foreign indebtedness, what lifted the mortgages from the farms all over this land from Maine to Kansas, what changed this nation from a debtor to a creditor nation, what gave birth, under God, to a new industrial and commercial era. Every fact stated shows that it bears no relation whatever to the tariff.

Let me read you what he says. You will find this on page 8 of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the year 1903, and I guess he will never write another one like this. He does not discuss this proposition in any of the subsequent reports. It is too good a Democratic document. He says:

> The consumption of cotton in this country is now greater than that of any other country, and yet the cotton planters of the South not only supplied this market last year, but exported a surplus of 3,569,000,000 pounds, valued at $317,000,000, or for every working day in the year about 12,000,000 pounds, worth more than $1,000,000.
> Represented in value, the exports of grain and grain products had about two-thirds the importance of cotton in the last fiscal year, the value of the export being more than $221,000,000. From 46,000,000 acres of wheat there was a surplus for foreign mouths amounting to 114,000,000 bushels and 20,000,000 barrels of flour, amounts that together represent 204,000,000 bushels of wheat.
> Third in importance are the exports of meats and meat products, with a grand total of $178,000,000, to which may be added $35,000,000 for live animals. Quantities that are beyond the grasp of the mind represent the exports of meats and their products. The pounds of beef were 385,000,000; of pork, 551,000,000; of lard, 491,000,000; and of oleo oil, 126,000,000.
>
> The foregoing figures, it should be borne in mind, do not stand for the total production of the farms, but for the surplus production after the wants of the people at home have been satisfied.
> THE FARMER'S BALANCE OF TRADE.
> The immense exports from the farms of the country lead to an examination of the so-called "balance of trade." This examination reveals what seems to have escaped the attention of the public, and that is, that the favorable balance of trade, everything included, is due to the still more favorable balance of trade in the products of the farm.
> During the thirteen years 1890–1902 the average annual excess of domestic exports over imports amounted to $275,000,000, and during the same time the annual average in favor of farm products was $337,000,000, from which it is apparent that there was an average annual adverse balance of trade in products other than those of the farm amounting to $62,000,000, which the farmers offset and had left $275,000,000 to the credit of themselves and the country.
>
> Taking the business of 1903, the comparison is much more favorable to the farmers than during the preceding thirteen-year period, since the value of domestic exports over imports was $367,000,000, the entire trade being included, while the excess for farm products was $422,000,000, which was sufficient not only to offset the unfavorable balance of trade of $56,000,000 in products other than those of the farm, but to leave, as stated above, the enormous favorable balance of $367,000,000.
>
> During the last fourteen years there was a balance of trade in favor of farm products, without excepting any year, that amounted to $4,806,000,000. Against this was an adverse balance of trade in products other than those of the farm of $865,000,000, and the farmers not only canceled this immense obligation, but had enough left to place $3,940,000,000 to the credit of the nation when the books of international exchange were balanced.
> These figures tersely express the immense national reserve-sustaining power of the farmers of the country under present quantities of production. It is the farmers who have paid the foreign bondholders.

The Secretary is from Iowa. He may agree with Cummins and that may account for this statement, but I am inclined to think that out of a real love of the farmers he wrote this and thoughtlessly struck the "stand-pat" doctrine a blow. And he gives the three great products which make up this trade—meat products, wheat, and cotton. Every one of those goes out into the markets of the world, as every man knows, unaffected by any tariff legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What year was that report?

Mr. BURGESS. The report was 1903, page 8.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has the price of farm products anything to do with that?

Mr. BURGESS. Well, of course if we gave them away we would not have gotten money for them. You certainly know that. But I shall not rest the case with the Secretary of Agriculture. I shall include in my remarks three tables furnished me in a letter of January 8 by the present Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and all through I have endeavored to confine the evidence I shall offer to the period covered by your complete control under the Dingley law. These tables show, first, merchandise imported and exported. the annual cost of exports over imports from 1896 to 1905. The next table shows the same grouped according to sources of production exported for the same years, and the next table gives the different sources of agricultural exports, of manufactured exports, and a comparison of each. I shall have occasion later on to refer to the last table, which shows the per cent of manufacturing exports for each year.

It is sufficient to say with reference to these tables that they establish the truth of the contention set out in Secretary Wilson's report, and establish beyond controversy the fact that the growth and development of this country, as a matter of fact, in the last ten years did not grow out of a protective tariff. Who contends that cotton is aided in price by the protective tariff? Who contends that wheat is aided in price by a protective tariff? Who is there, with sense enough to rattle in a tobacco seed, who does not know that the European price of those two great staples fixes the American price, barring the manipulation of speculators at particular periods? Let us trace the source and progress of prosperity. Other countries have not sufficient products of their own to feed and clothe their people, and there is in foreign markets a demand for cotton, wheat, and meat. Our cotton, wheat, and stock raisers have produced a great excess above home consumption. What happens then? So much is produced as that not only 80,000,000 inhabitants of the United States are supplied, but an immense surplus is borne down the lines of railway to the sea, and into the holds of the vessels of the world, and by them carried into the markets of the world, under the banner, if you please, of absolute free trade, and in competition in the markets of the world with all these products.

In turn for these products the gold of Europe is poured in a great tide back into American homes. Then what happens? There is an increased capacity to buy on the part of those engaged in the production of these great products, and wherever there exists such an increased capacity on the part of the people to satisfy their needs or their desires more purchases occur. This people, thus blessed by soil and season and their intelligent industry, go about in the stores of the land and buy the various things they need to satisfy their wants or desires—aye, their fancies and whims—and retail trade, closest to and most dependent upon the people, rapidly responds to this birth of prosperity.

The retail dealers begin to buy, through drummers and by letters, of the wholesale houses. Wholesale houses, realizing the impetus to their trade, make larger drafts upon the manufacturer, and the manufacturer gets a move on him; the smoke begins to rush faster and higher out of the factory chimneys, and the railroads get busy, and all along the pathway thus described, from the field to the foreign market, back again, and from the home people to the manufacturer and back again, labor everywhere gets increased employment, and an added capacity to buy, predicated upon the original capacity to buy, occurs. And thus in an endless chain in God's ordained way prosperity rolls on unfettered and blesses the American people regardless of whether the President is named Grover Cleveland or William McKinley.

Prosperity comes to our country in no other way than this natural way, which augments the national wealth by the products of the soil. God made this country to feed the world, and keyed its potent forces upon its fertile soil and favorable climate. The American farmer, who plants in faith, cultivates in hope, and reaps in grace, is the uncrowned king of the world.

Long may he reign, unfettered to pour out his products into the markets of the world, to bless foreign nations, and to enrich his own.

Now, this was not the only cause of the gradually growing prosperity of this country. There was another one which cooperated with it, perhaps as potent in cooperation as any other factor could possibly be. I offer in evidence a table furnished me by the Secretary of the Treasury in a letter dated June 12, 1906, in which he gives me the kinds of money coined and issued and in general stock, and in circulation as well, July 1, 1896, and every succeeding year down to the present, with the tables attached, and which I shall incorporate in my remarks. That statement shows that in those ten years there have been added, in round numbers, to the circulating medium of this country in gold coin and certificates $698,000,000; in United States notes added in circulation, $150,000,000; in silver certificates, $138,000,000; in standard silver dollars, $26,000,000; in subsidiary silver coin, $50,000,000, and in national-bank notes, $330,000,000, showing an increase in the stock of coin issued of $863,000,000 and an increase in circulation of $1,234,000,000.

By the way, not a dollar of that was coined by virtue of a protective tariff or as the result of any other Republican legislation.

Now, let me state a fundamental principle of the money question as to which Republicans and Democrats have always agreed. It is that the money system of this country shall rest upon intrinsic value coinage, and that every paper dollar shall be redeemable in such coined dollar, and that all the dollars coined or issued shall be equal in purchasing as well as debt-paying power. And no respectable Republican, or Democrat either, in the history of the country, ever denied either of those propositions. The differences which have arisen grow merely out of some proposed method of increasing or decreasing the money volume in accordance with these fundamental principles. Both parties have uniformly opposed fiatism—the Greenback party and the Greenback idea in all of its forms. Their national platforms show this. In principle there never was any difference among the leaders of Democratic thought on these matters with reference even to the silver question itself. The contention was, and the difference of opinion between Democrats was, as to whether by the method proposed these principles could be conformed to. Those of the Bland-Bryan school thought it could, and those of the Cleveland-Carlisle school thought it could not. There was no difference in principle, but a difference merely in judgment as to the effect of a law. The addition of this immense money volume has removed that question from controversy in the country among Democrats or between Democrats and Republicans. That is one of the reasons why you see men of all shades of thought on the money question, but holding to the fundamental principles that I have stated, uniting now in the proposed support of the same man that fought for free silver in 1896.

Let me announce one other proposition to which all men of this fundamental view on the money question have ever agreed. It is this: Granting that all the dollars coined and issued by the Government are equal in purchasing and debt-paying power with every other dollar, and that they rest on an intrinsic value coinage, and that the paper money is redeemable in such coined dollars, all men of that school of thought have ever agreed that, as you increase the volume in proportion to population and business, you increase price generally, and as you increase general prices you invite investment, stimulate enterprise, aid labor, and promote prosperity. That is exactly what occurred in the connection with the other facts I have stated—that throwing into circulation in ten years of $1,234,000,000, together with a vast balance of trade in our favor. Pouring money back into this country from Europe, wiping out our foreign obligations, adding to the demand for the manufactured articles, and an increased volume of money, causing the general rise in prices of stocks and bonds, in lands, and in every form of value, inviting investment, a tide of prosperity rolled over the land that I trust God may permit to continue. And these Republican boasters and claimers, who would claim anything on earth, and argue with effrontery, seized upon these gifts of God and claimed they produced them with their Dingley law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to state further facts from the Secretary of the Treasury which confirm these contentions, and they are the national-bank statistics of the country. Now, think a minute. This is another proposition about which there is no party difference among sensible men. We are all agreed that one of the best evidences of the continued and permanent prosperity of a section or a State is the showing made by its bank capital and surplus, and especially their individual deposits. Now, I will introduce in evidence an article clipped from the Manufacturers' Record, which I submitted for correction and revision to Secretary Shaw, and which he returned to me in a letter, dated January 13, 1906, making slight corrections which do not affect the text. It is a long statement comparing the ratio and extent of development for twenty-five years in number, capital, surplus, and individual deposits of the South—the free-trade South, if you please—against all the rest of the country:

BANKING IN THE SOUTH—REMARKABLE PROGRESS MADE IN FINANCIAL GROWTH IN A DECADE.

[From Manufacturers' Record.]

The wonderful progress of the South is in no way better illustrated than by the enormous growth of its banking facilities. In 1880 there were 220 national banks in the entire South from Maryland to Texas, but now there are 1,221. In 1889 the national-banking capital in this section was only $45,598,000, now it is $126,037,000; and while twenty-five years ago the surplus of the South's national banks was only $9,000,000 and a few thousands over, it is now $50,257,000. National-bank deposits in the South have grown from $64,729,000 to over $469,032,000 within the same period.

But it is by comparison with the growth of the national-banking system in the entire country that the establishment of national banks in the South displays its conspicuous gains. The number of national banks in the entire country in 1880 was 2,090; now it is 5,757, an increase of 175.45 per cent; but the growth in the South from 220 to 1,221 national banks is an increase of 455 per cent. Furthermore, while the national-banking capital in the whole country advanced during those twenty-five years from $457,553,985 to $799,870,229, an increase of 74.79 per cent, the South's growth from over $45,000,000 to more than $126,000,000 of national-banking capital in the same time is a gain of 176.46 per cent; also the national-banking surplus in the whole country rose from over $120,000,000 to nearly $418,000,000, an increase of 246.63 per cent, but the national-banking surplus in the South, by going from $9,000,000 to over $50,000,000, displays an increase of 457.72 per cent. This shows the rapidity of southern advancement in a striking manner.

Not the least interesting feature of these statistics is the gain displayed by some States in the number of national banks therein. Mississippi, for instance, had no national banks in 1880—although thirteen years previously she had two—but in 1905 she had 25. The great State of Texas had 13 national banks a quarter of a century ago; now she has 440; Florida had only 2 then, but now 34; Virginia had 17, now 85; West Virginia had 17, but now 79; Georgia had 13, now 63; Alabama had 9, now 67. Both Maryland and Kentucky had each a comparatively large number of national banks in 1880, the former possessing 35, and to-day 89, while the latter then had 49, but now 124.

But most of the large gains in the number of national banks are clearly results of the act of March 14, 1900, authorizing the establishment of the national banks with less than $50,000 capital. For instance, on April 26, 1900, Texas had 200 national banks; now she has 440, as heretofore stated; Alabama had 28, now 67; Georgia 27, now 63; West Virginia on April 26, 1900, 36, now 79; Virginia 39, now 85; Kentucky on April 26, 1900, 75, now 124; Arkansas had 7, now 28; Louisiana on April 26, 1900, 20, now 35.

National-banking capital in the South rose from a total of about $45,500,000 in 1880 to nearly $92,500,000 in 1890, but in 1900 it had fallen back to about $86,500,000. Yet during the last five years it has risen from that comparatively low figure to over $126,000,000. But there has never been any halt in the gain of southern banking surplus. From $9,000,000 in 1880 it rose to $24,000,000 in 1890, and to $30,000,000 in 1900 and $50,000,000 in 1905. Undivided profits have gone up from below $4,000,000 in 1880 to nearly $12,000,000 in 1890, to more than $15,000,000 in 1900, and to nearly $27,000,000 in 1905.

Could any record of accomplishment be more impressive than this? Yet it must be remembered that in this quarter of a century deposits in southern national banks have increased from a total of $64,729,000 to a total of $469,032,328, which is a gain of very nearly 625 per cent. And it must furthermore not be forgitten that these statistics do not include the numerous private and State banks in the South, which number many more than the national banks therein, nor the trust companies, which also engage in banking, all of which classes of financial institutions are constantly growing in numbers and strength.

The increase in number of national banks in the whole country was 175 per cent; in the South, 445 per cent. The increase in capital in the whole country was 74 per cent; the increase in the South was 176 per cent. The increase in surplus in the whole country was 146 per cent, and in the South 457 per cent. But in order to make this more striking, I addressed a letter to the Comptroller of the Treasury, which was replied to on June 18, 1906, in which he gives a statement of the facts reduced to percentages for the ten-year period about which you boast. I have taken two distinctively agricultural States and two distinctively protective-tariff States of equal population. I have contrasted Texas and Massachusetts, Mississippi and Connecticut. I wish to say, in passing, that the significance of the immense figures disclosed here will be increased when you bear in mind the fact that 50 per cent of the population of Mississippi are colored people and do not have much surplus in the banks, and perhaps 25 per cent of the population of Texas are the same.

In Texas in ten years the increase in banks is 120 per cent; in capital in banks the increase is 157 and in surplus 115 per cent; and in individual deposits 326 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In Massachusetts there was a decrease of 22 per cent in number of banks, and 36 per cent in the amount of capital; 1 per cent increase in surplus, and 31 per cent increase in individual deposits. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Take the State of Mississippi. Mississippi in the number of banks increased in ten years 140 per cent; capital, 235 per cent; surplus, 137 per cent, and in individual deposits, 370 per cent.

What about Connecticut? There was a decrease of 3 per cent in the number of banks; of 9 per cent in banking capital; an increase in surplus of 13 per cent, and in individual deposits, 52 per cent.

Now, gentlemen, when you talk about a protective tariff producing prosperity, I fling these facts in your teeth, and ask you to explain how it got so far from base. [Applause.] The application of your doctrine tests it. If protection produces prosperity, it will first spring into being where it is born and abide best there. If it produces prosperity, you must look for it where the States are that contain the factories. Yet, strange to relate, there is where you find strikes, labor seeking for employment—barred out by the occupation of the home market, with the stifling of competition by the trusts and monopolies organized under your accursed system. [Loud applause.] Down South, where there are no factories to be protected, under the blessings of God, of soil, and of season, enjoying the fruits of farm work, we will show you a country great, magnificent in advantages and strides of progress, of which not one is due to your system. [Applause.] But I have said this doctrine is pernicious in its teachings. First, it teaches an idea that is demoralizing and ruinous—the doctrine that men should look to law rather than to God and themselves for their industrial success. It teaches men of all classes to rush to the Government for every ill that afflicts them. It confesses that restricted competition increases the price by protection. How does it protect unless it increases the price, so that the manufacturer may prosper, that some of the profits may get into the hands of labor; that the home market may be strengthened? You admit that the blessings are in the manufacturers' hands at the start and filter down from this avaricious class to the great herd of common people below. Not only does it teach that false doctrine, but you have demoralized all the labor of the country, and now yourselves are engaged in a war with that very labor. You have misguided their intellect and aspirations and tendencies, and the question now is, whether you shall kick them out and refuse the demands they make and bar the door against them, or give them justice against the trusts and combines protection has produced and sustained in great profits.

You are up against it. I leave it to you to settle with labor. There is no trouble with a Democrat. He tells them the same old doctrine that has rung from every hilltop since the birth of the Republic. We know nobody as a class. We fight for political equality of all, under the banner of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We can do nothing for one man except what is right to do for every other man under like conditions. The Republican party may offer to trade with you. They are the great traders of the country. They will trade off anything on earth for votes. They will even trade off the sacred fund of the widows and orphans, piled up through the policy holders of the country, in order to get American votes.

But that is not all. This doctrine has led to what is now termed "practical politics," and that has led to graft. That has led to corruption in public life and out of it. That has led to the prostitution of every great business; to the purchase of legislation. If these protected men contribute vast sums to maintain the party in power that stands for that doctrine, the transition is easy for every corporation that wants governmental favoritism to pay the price and expect to get the goods. They have been doing it right along, and you all know it. You are in a desperate struggle now, after a long lease of power, under the effect of this doctrine, cleaning you stables. You have put many in the penitentiary, and God knows many ought to be there, and you know it, too, and the country is ready to follow the cry, "Reduce and revise the tariff, administer exact and equal justice, let us look at the books, nominate Bryan, and turn the rascals out." [Applause.]

Nothing could be more ruinous, my countrymen, than the idea that campaign funds can be contributed to maintain any sort of class legislation. It is wrong morally, and therefore fatal in political effect on a free and independent republic to raise a great cry about injury to a factory or injury to a bank, as the stand-patter talks, in order to scare these men into digging up and getting a campaign fund to elect his gang. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you want to know the purpose of all this manifestation of stand-pat oratory, that is it. Not that the men who indulge in it are selling themselves. No; they are too high-minded politicians for that. They do not handle the dirty dollars. Others do that. They only raise the cry; they get up the scare; the goods are delivered to others; others do the work, and the game goes on.

But I want to turn now to say something for the plaintiff's case, Mr. Square Deal, so much neglected by his original daddy, in the discharge of his stepfather duties. What does "square deal" mean? It means equality for everybody; the same number of cards fairly dealt that every other player gets; the same rights in the game; an equal opportunity.

Everybody knows what a "square deal" means in a card game. It is a card-game expression for an old, elementary Democratic truth. Translated into statesmanlike language it means "equal rights for all and special privileges for none." No dealing cards from the bottom of the deck, no cold deck, no hand out to anybody, but a square deal. It is a Democratic child. I claim Democracy wherever I see it, even if portions of it ooze out of the White House at times. It is a good thing, coming from any direction. Now, let us apply it to the tariff, and it is a proposition for which the Democratic party has always stood. The truth is there never was but one fundamental Democratic principle. It applied to free speech and to free men at the beginning, when Jefferson wrote the Kentucky draft of his resolutions. It has applied to every piece of legislation from that day to this. It means that the cardinal rule in legislation is to legislate so that equal rights to all shall be the result of the legislation, and that no one shall get out of it any special privilege.

That is what is the matter with the tariff. Now, let us see if we do not get special privileges. I want to quote these distinguished orators again. Mr. LANDIS said in that speech in discussing the question of the surplus sale of foreign products:

> We needed the protective tariff, first, to enable us to build the factory. Now that we have the factory running, we need a protective tariff to protect the American market and the laborer who is working in this American factory; and we will continue to need it until the American laborer is willing to work for the low wages paid the foreign laborer.

Then he says:

> "Why, they are selling abroad cheaper than they are selling at home." Mr. Chairman, I say to you that that contention, which I do not deny, is to my mind the highest tribute that can be paid to the Dingley law. [Applause on the Republican side.] Under this Dingley law, which started all the factories that Democracy closed, we have builded thousands and tens of thousands of additional factories, and we have put them all into commission. We are consuming 92 per cent of all the products that they manufacture, and in addition to that we are meeting in the open market of the world all the manufacturers of Christendom, and we are underselling them—glory be it to the American name and to the Dingley law.

Mr. DALZELL says:

We have in this country, by reason of the skill of our workmen, by reason of our general prosperity, by reason of our inventive genius, by reason of our improved machinery, arrived at a period when we can make in this country on an average of nine months all that the country can consume in the year.

It is a plain business proposition whether or not we shall run the year around and sell all of our goods in any market, or whether we shall run nine months and close up our factories the other three. But that is not the only reason. Another reason is because, in order to gain a foothold in foreign markets, the price must be regulated so as to meet the price in the foreign market with which we come in competition. And another reason is because in our contest for entrance into the world's markets, we have to encounter a system of tariffs, of syndicates, of cartels, of bounties, all of which were made for the purpose of excluding us from those markets. And another reason is because it is a custom as old as commerce itself, and a universally recognized industrial policy. And still another reason is because the merchants of all countries have two schedules of prices—a home price and an export price.

Now, in what way does this practice help us? It keeps our factories going and our men from idleness. It maintains the American wage. It secures us a foothold in, and, ultimately, to some extent, a command of foreign markets. It does no harm.

Mr. PALMER makes the same statements.

Now, I want to lay down two propositions growing out of these statements by these distinguished advocates of the defendant in this suit.

First, confession is made that we have occupied the home markets fully, and in nine months we make as much as the whole American market will consume, and that the amount made in three months constitutes the surplus of sales abroad cheaper than at home, and must be maintained in order to maintain the system.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman pardon one question?

Mr. BURGESS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These gentlemen have said that in nine months we make all that the home market can consume. Did any of these gentlemen go further and add that we made all that the home market can consume if these protective products sold in the home markets at the same price that they sold abroad?

Mr. BURGESS. No; they are pretty reckless, but I don't think they would do that; that would be too obviously foolish; but they say, contending for the stand-pat doctrine, that it is necessary in order to retain the labor now employed in their production; and I say that your confession as to the surplus by sale abroad utterly destroys all the logic and philosophy upon which the founders of the economic theory of protection grounded the doctrine, and you can not deny it.

What did the great leaders—what did Blaine, what did Garfield, what did Morrell, what did all the great men who stood for protection argue? They said, "This is how protection brings prosperity: By restricting competition in the home market, it invites capital to invest in competing factories, and that gives increased employment to labor, and because of increased employment there is an increased wage, which causes an increased capacity to buy, and that strengthens the home market; and by that process those who raise products like cotton, corn, wheat, rye, oats, chickens, butter, and eggs, are enabled to get back in increased prices what they lost by the increased price they pay for articles manufactured."

This is a fair statement of the philosophy by which each of the great advocates of protection have attempted to demonstrate its economic value in the development of the whole country. The concession by these distinguished stand-pat orators takes all this philosophy out of the present support of the doctrine, for it is perfectly obvious that if the protected manufacturers can in nine months make sufficient, at present prices and under present conditions, to supply the home-market demand, that it is useless to longer argue that protection invites the investment of capital in additional factories to supply the home market, or that the demand for increased employment to labor can be thus produced, or that the home market can be thus strengthened. Instead, therefore, of all present conditions sustaining the original logic of protection, they overthrow it completely, and the bold position is forced upon the stand-patters to contend for the continuance of existing schedules in order that existing factories may continue to run, and that employed labor may hold its own. Any capital seeking investment, or any labor seeking employment—not now invested, not now employed—must "wait for dead men's shoes."

Ah, but that is not the worst. Another admission follows swiftly on the heels of that, a logical deduction that is worse than that admission. As soon as the manufacturers covered the home market, then what happened? They had but one of two avenues by which to maintain an increased business. They must fall to competing in the home market among themselves and thus reducing the price, cut down profits in order to extend their business, or they must combine together to hold the price up to the limit afforded by protection and sell their surplus in foreign markets; and that is exactly what they do, because that yields more profit than any other available avenue. That is why in ten years industrial combinations in all the products that are taxed have sprung up all over the country; that is why they are selling abroad more cheaply than at home; that is why the price of things we buy is under the domination and control of combinations, and a rival factory with more favorable locality and closer market, which would tend to bring down the price, is mashed to earth by these combinations, who then say to the Republican party: "Stand pat. How much do you want to keep this game going?" That is not all. That is not the worst effect of it. It not only stifles competition, but it bars the door to every coming young American, whether in individual manufacturing enterprise or in the domain of labor, or both. It forces the home market under the control of combinations, prevents industrial competition, bars the door to increased employment of labor, and thus destroys every vestige of a square deal to the American voter. I want to note another peculiar thing involved in these admissions. They attempt to plead confession and avoidance. After admitting the facts of the huge sale abroad for the last few years, they say, "Well, it is only 3 per cent of the total products raised in this country," and it is too small to amount to much. That reminds me of the famous incident in the story by Captain Marryat of Peter Simple, which I will not relate at this time. It is "such a little thing" in consideration of the vast commerce as not to have any appreciable effect, they say. The tables show it is 36 per cent of our exports. Now, let me state a proposition. Under normal conditions, applicable to all trade everywhere, under all conditions, if unaffected by other laws, let me say to you that it is an economic principle, as eternal in trade as is the law of gravitation, that the price of a product in the furthest market in which it is sold, less the cost and commissions of selling it there, fixes the price of the product in all intervening markets and in the field of production as well. The housewives in the country long ago found out that if the hens get busy and lay more eggs in Indiana than the local markets can take care of, and they are shipped to Chicago and New York and other great cities, then the city price, less the cost of shipping the goods there and the commission of the wholesaler and the retailer, fixes the price of every egg laid in Indiana, and the hen nor anybody else can not get away from that law.

Every wheat raiser, every cotton raiser, every man who has thought of it, whether he comprehends the philosophy of the law or not, has felt it in its operation and result. There is but one class of people in the United States that do not conform to this law. The manufacturer who sells abroad cheaper than at home violates this fundamental and universal law of trade, to which everybody else who furnishes a product to be sold in excess of his individual consumption must conform. It reminds me of the story of an Irish school-teacher who wanted to illustrate the law of gravitation to me. He said that if I would drop a dollar, it would fall to the floor, but if I held out my other hand and caught it, the law of resistance would suspend the law of gravitation, and the dollar would not fall. Now, protection and the Dingley law thrust out the law of resistance to the universal law of trade and suspended it in the interest of the American manufacturer and against every consumer's interest in the American market. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, this subject needs to be submitted to thoughtful minds, not by garbled accounts of ancient history, not by twisted expositions of party platforms. The sharp, defined issue is presented to the country, Do you favor the reduction and revision of the tariff? This House on that side is full of men who do, and party whip and party power makes them sit silent here while the stand-patters do all the talking. I warn these gentlemen that the people in the districts from which they come can not be whipped into silence on this issue; that if this issue be fought out, as in 1884 and in 1892, the facts are infinitely stronger for Democratic control and ascendency now than then, and your party in a far less worthy and sensible position to maintain the doctrine of protection. Personally I want to see the fight for tariff revision and reduction come in the coming Congressional campaign. I am not willing, however, that anybody shall put me in the false position of being what is called a "free trader." No Democratic platform ever declared for free trade from the first platform, in 1840, down to date. They have declared invariably for a tariff for revenue, and the first resolution on the subject, adopted in 1840, was repeated in every national Democratic platform down to and including 1860, and under that expression the Walker tariff was enacted, which gave construction to the expression and remains to-day the settled Democratic doctrine.

What was that idea? Put everything in three classes—necessities, comforts, and luxuries—levy the same rate on each class, a higher rate on comforts and a still higher rate on luxuries, and enough on the whole to raise sufficient revenue to meet the needs of honest economical government. It has been always admitted that under that basis, especially when levied upon competing articles, that the tariff laid would carry the incidental evil of a benefit to the manufacturer of that article to the extent of the tariff laid inherent in the system of taxation from which Democracy could not get away without destroying the constitutional system of taxation, which it has never sought to do. Nor does it seek to do it now. More than that, let no manufacturer be afraid that Democracy will ruthlessly ruin his business, for Democracy is as much opposed to ruining by legislation an existing industry as to hothouse one into existence by legislation. We shall deal as sensible men with the condition that confronts us, and we shall gradually apply the correct theory of tariff for revenue so as to bring the greatest good to the greatest number of people and the least injury to any individual that can be produced. That is the sound, sensible Democratic position, and we shall not be put in any other attitude by whatever you gentlemen say. [Loud applause.]

No correct conception of what is meant by a tariff for revenue can be had without comprehending the underlying basic Democratic doctrine that the tariff is a tax, a Federal tax, collected from the consumers of the articles taxed, and that the same immutable principles applicable to all just taxation are applicable to the tariff, as well as the fact that all incidental evils applicable to all taxation are inherent in the tariff system of taxation. All taxation tends to discourage investment in the particular form of property taxed. The failure to tax any property tends to encourage investment in that form of property rather than in the forms that are taxed, hence the doctrine of uniform equal taxation is the only just rule, the only method by which a "square deal" to all can be maintained. We have said that the correct rule of tariff taxation is to levy a tariff of some amount on practically all imports, so as to lay the burden of contribution to the support of the Government on the greatest number of people, on the one hand, and to lessen the incidental evil of class benefit inherent in the system, on the other hand, to the greatest extent that the system of taxation fixed by the Constitution will permit.

The trouble with you Republicans is that you seize upon the incidental evil of this system of taxation and make it the basis of its operation, and, having done this to the limit, you have produced the evils of which I have spoken, and a "square deal" is being demanded by thoughtful patriots everywhere. [Loud applause.] This issue, like Banquo's ghost, is an honest one and will not down. The present popularity of your President grows out of his Democratic tendencies on other lines, and he must go on and apply his doctrine of a "square deal" to the tariff or he must abandon the expression. Whichever he does, the action of Democracy will not be affected. We shall fling out our old banner. Sometimes that of defeat, sometimes that of victory, but ever honorable and ever bearing the unanswerable slogan of "Equal rigths to all and special privileges to none." We shall nominate as our standard bearer in 1908 that man who has stood for years for every popular contention advocated by the present occupant of the White House, for, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky in this House, Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, there is not a single issue advocated by Theodore Roosevelt that is popular with the American people to-day but that bears "the bloody stain of Bryan's faithful feet." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD three pages of Farquhar's Economic Delusions and a letter from that distinguished, though deceased, Republican and protectionist, Secretary McCulloch, giving a history of American panics and their causes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reply to the remarks of Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD three pages from Farquhar's Economic and Industrial Delusions and a letter from that distinguished, though deceased Republican and protectionist, Secretary McCulloch, giving a history of American panics and their causes. I insert in reply to the "Panic and Tariff" chart of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY].

It completely refutes or explains away every statement made by the gentleman.

Mr. Farquhar says (italics are my own):

It is a fact, I admit, that the crash of 1857 occurred after duties had been put exceptionally low. But that crisis, though very severe in its onset, was far less extensive and lasting than the later one beginning in 1873, under a high tariff; while its effects disappeared after a year or two, we took six years to recover from the great crash of 1873. As there is no doubt that duties were enormously high during our last panic [author means 1873—J. S. W.], protectionists generally pass it over and go back to that of 1837, claiming that the troubles of that day were due to the reductions made in import duties by the acts of 1832 and 1833. It should be remembered that the 1833 act, known as the "Compromise Tariff," which provided for general import rates of 20 per cent, was not to go into full effect until 1842, nine years after its passage. It was the result of an understanding between Clay and Calhoun, representing opposite opinions on the subject, Clay admitting that no industry was entitled to protection which could not make itself self-sustaining in nine years. At the time the reduction was less considered as a source of financial difficulties than the great elevation of duties in 1828, whose instigators were put to it to satisfy their fellow-citizens that it was not their own measure that had caused the trouble. The notion that the panic was brought on by the compromise tariff seems to have been invented many years later by an amiable, ingenious, and undoubtedly cranky publisher of Philadelphia, Henry Charles Carey, whose writings, "voluminous and vast," are far oftener talked of than read. Carey was not the sort of person who would consciously misrepresent facts; but the mind that could overlook the real causes—to wit, reckless speculation and huge and rapidly increasing State and municipal debts incurred for internal improvements, to say nothing of the collapse of the banking system of the country under the well-meant but over-violent attacks of an impetuous chief magistrate, and could ascribe such an effect to the relief of the people from a few unendurably oppressive import taxes—is a mind too distorted and prejudiced to serve as a guide in any rational inquiry.

The 1837 crisis, moreover, involved this country and Europe together. [This was likewise the case in 1893—J. S. W.]. The Europeans had another severe crisis ten years later, in 1847, just after another large reduction of duties in this country. If Carey's invention was ever to have an application, then 1847 should have been the time [especially as the year 1842 before 1846 saw another tariff reduction—J. S. W.]. But of the 1847 crisis, in which we ought by his rules to be fatally involved, our country felt not a trace, or far less disturbance at all events, than it underwent in 1825, just after an increase of duties. A particularly severe crisis began with us in 1818, under circumstances very like those of 1873, for the duties were then—disobligingly enough—decidedly higher than they had been before the war.

Having seen how the facts really stand with regard to the first "low-tariff" panic, need we be at a loss to account for that of 1857? To anyone who remembers the "wild-cat" currency then in circulation, whose every note, usually made payable at some branch bank located in an inaccessible place, had to be carefully conned and gauged—perhaps discounted, too—before it could be accepted, and the shameful inadequacy and venality of the State banking laws under which the most of it was issued, there is no occasion to look to national customs rates for an explanation.

Credit was then an edifice on a shaky foundation, sure to collapse when built up high enough. The only surprising thing about the 1857 crisis, to my mind, was the ease and buoyancy with which we recovered from it. In that respect it was altogether exceptional.

Now, hear the testimony of Hugh McCulloch, former Republican Secretary of the Treasury, now dead. Mr. Farquhar adds:

To supplement this fragmentary sketch of our panic history in the best way possible, I add a few paragraphs of testimony from the man who, of all men living [this was in 1891—J. S. W.] is most competent to speak on the subject, and whom it is least possible to look on as warped or hampered by prejudice. For years at the head of one of the very few creditable and successful State banking systems, afterwards Comptroller of the Currency at the most critical period of the war and Secretary of the Treasury under three administrations, Hon. Hugh McCulloch needs no recommendation to public confidence; while his well-known standing as a Clay Whig, and afterwards an earnest Republican, would certainly acquit him of partisan bias, were it possible for any reader to bring any accusation of the sort against language so calm and courteous—so indicative of ripe knowledge, clear sagacity, and judicial spirit. The following paragraphs are taken from his refutation of a protectionist tirade by Mr. Blaine, and first appeared in the New York Times, February 3, 1890:

"THE REVERSES OF 1837.

"Of these reverses and all subsequent ones I can speak advisedly, because I held positions of financial responsibility and had personal interests at stake. I was in 1837, and had been for a considerable time, the manager of the branch at Fort Wayne and a member of the board of control of the State Bank of Indiana. Mr. Blaine's statement that 'the years 1834–1836 were distinguished for all manner of business hazards' but faintly describes them. They were years, especially 1836, of the wildest speculation. In the East it was varied in character, but its dangerous elements were excessive credits, and there were few things that could be bought or sold that were not affected by it.

"In the West it was confined to wild lands and lands unimproved and town lots, many of which never had any existence except upon the recorded plats. It was speculation similar to that in the timber lands of Maine a few years before. Lands bought of the Government at $1.25 per acre were soon sold on credit at $4, $5, and in some cases $10. Hundreds of tracts were laid off in town lots where the original forests were still standing. What took place under my own observation seems now to be too absurd to have been real. On the Maumee River, from its mouth on Lake Erie, there was for miles a succession of towns. Some of them, like Maumee City, Perrysburg, Manhattan, and Toledo, were realities, but most of them existed upon paper only. In the spring of 1836 a young man, whom I met at Maumee City, said to me that he had made a great deal of money in a few months. To my inquiry, how he had made it, he replied, 'by buying and selling lots.' 'Maumee City,' said he, 'lies, as you know, at the foot of the rapids, and is destined to be one of the great cities of the West; property is rising rapidly in value, and I am buying and selling every day.'

"'How did you raise the money to commence with?'

"'Oh, very little money is required in this business. I pay when I buy and I require when I sell a lot a few dollars to bind the bargain, but nearly everything is done upon credit.'

"On my way from New York to Fort Wayne, in the same year, I stopped over night at a hotel in Toledo. After dinner I noticed that there was a gathering of gentlemen in the parlor, and in the course of the evening I was waited upon by one whom I knew and invited to join it. 'Our rule' said he, 'is to admit no one to these meetings who is not worth $100,000. As you are a banker, you must be worth at least that.' This was far from being the fact, but I accepted the invitation. The company consisted of gentlemen, some of whom I knew personally and others by reputation. They were politicians, scholars, writers, and one or two of them authors of considerable renown, but not one was there whom I recognized as being engaged in regular business pursuits. It was a sort of private exchange, at which the members made themselves rich by buying and selling to each other lands and town lots. There was at times a good deal of excitement, much like that which is witnessed in the New York Stock Exchange. When the meeting closed everyone felt that he was richer than when it opened. In a few brief months there was not one of these hundred-thousand-dollar men who was worth a hundred thousand cents.

"RESULTS OF THE SPECULATIVE MANIA.

"The same speculative mania prevailed to some extent all over the country. It originated in unwise extension of the credit system, which was mainly the result of the removal of the Government deposits from the United States bank and the placing of them in State banks. When the deposits were removed there was, among conservative men, great apprehension that the effect would be severe financial trouble. To prevent this it seemed to be the understanding between the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the direction of the President and the banks—pet banks as they were called—that as they had been favored by the Government in the use of the public moneys, they should deal liberally with their customers. This they did, and, as their capitals were sufficient to supply the demands of healthy business, the loans of the Government deposits were made to men who were engaged in speculative enterprises. Then, too, many of the States were engaged in works of internal improvement, and were spending large amounts of money which they had obtained by sales of their bonds in Europe.

In addition to the large volumes of currency thus put into circulation, a bank under the name of the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States was chartered by Pennsylvania as the successor to the United States Bank, with the same capital and mostly the same managers, which not only loaned its money in a manner which savored of recklessness, but bought large quantities of cotton on its own account. Never were credits so easily obtained nor so unwisely used; never to the superficial observer had the country been so prosperous.

"In the meantime, however, industry was declining, and all kinds of agricultural productions were commanding exorbitant prices. Wheat went up from $1 to $2 a bushel, and cotton from 7 to 15 cents a pound. A speculative fever everywhere prevailed similar in character, and as much more disastrous in consequences as it was wider in extent, to the South Sea bubble in England. Conservative men, strangely enough, as well as adventurers, were its abettors and its victims. Banking institutions, and especially the Government depositories, were in a great measure responsible for it, and not a few were ruined.

"I call to mind one case which interested me greatly. In the spring of 1836 I went to a city in a State adjoining Indiana to make with its leading bank exchanges of New York and New England bank notes for its notes, which were receivable at the Government land offices. As I knew the president personally, I called upon him at the bank after banking hours. I was kindly received, but I noticed that he was in bad humor, which he did not try to conceal, the cause of which he explained. 'I have,' said he, 'for the first time since I became president of the bank been squarely overruled in a matter of great importance. I do not like,' he went on to say, 'the business outlook. The people seem to me to have gone mad, and if I am not greatly mistaken they will soon find out that the prosperity of the country is unreal. We owe the Government a large amount of money, and as we have enough and something more in the hands of New York to pay it, at the meeting of the board this afternoon I introduced a resolution in favor of paying the debt and dissolving our connection with the Government. In offering the resolution I explained as fully as I was able to do my reasons for doing so. I was listened to attentively, but when the vote was taken there was but one vote (my own) in its favor. Not only was the resolution voted down, but I was instructed to use the money to our credit in New York in current business at home. To my directors the idea of giving up the use of a large amount of money on which we pay nothing, when it might be loaned at high rates of interest, seemed to be absurd. I hope they are right; time will show.' Time, and short time at that, did show. In little more than one year this great bank, which up to the time of its connection with the Government had been conservatively and profitably managed, was ruinously, hopelessly broken, and some of the directors who were its borrowers went down with it.

AFTER THE PANIC OF 1837.

Of the reverses of 1837 [five years after law of 1832 reducing tariff duties, J. S. W.] I made the following remarks in my report as Secretary of the Treasury in 1865:

"The great expansion of 1835 and 1836, ending with the terrible financial collapse of 1837, from the effects of which the country did not rally for years, was the consequence of excessive bank circulation and discounts, and an abuse of the credit system, stimulated in the first place by Government deposits with the State banks, and swelled by currency and credits, until, under the wild spirit of speculation which pervaded the country, labor and production decreased to such an extent that the country of the world became an importer of breadstuffs.

"The balance of trade had been for a long time favorable to Europe and against the United States, and also in favor of the commercial cities of the seaboard and against the interior, but a vicious system of credits prevented the prompt settlement of balances. The importers established large credits abroad, by means of which they were enabled to give favorable terms to the jobbers. The jobbers in turn were thus, and by liberal accommodations from the banks, able to give their own time to country merchants, who in turn sold to their customers on infinite credit. It then seemed to be more reputable to borrow money than to earn it, and pleasanter and apparently more profitable to speculate than to work. And so the people ran headlong into debt, labor decreased, production fell off, and ruin followed."

This was, of course, a panic sharp and terrific, but it was of short duration. It was soon followed by a lethargy under which all the springs of enterprise and hopefulness were dried up. To prevent the sacrifice of property under judicial decrees, stay laws and appraisement laws were enacted by many of the States, which only aggravated the trouble. For long, weary years the lethargy continued. There was no demand for anything except the necessaries of life, and all these, except clothing, were sold for scarcely enough, and in some cases not enough, to pay the expenses of taking them to market. I witnessed a sale in 1839 [seven years after law of '32, J. S. W.] to the keeper of a hotel in Indianapolis of oats at 10 cents a bushel, and fine chickens at 50 cents a dozen. The same year I saw thousands of barrels of flour under the sheds of Suydam, Sage & Co., in New York, which they were offering at $3.50 a barrel. Fat cattle were selling at so low a price—$10 and $12 a head—that my brother thought that he would pack a few barrels of beef at Fort Wayne for the New York market. He did so, and was drawn upon by his consignees for a part of the expenses of transportation not covered by the sales. From 1837 to 1841 there was nothing to break the stagnation but the political campaign of 1840, in which everybody became enlisted for want of something else to do. In the fall of 1841 a reaction began to appear. This became decided in 1842, before the tariff of that year went into operation, and in 1845 the country, chastened by adversity, was in the full tide of healthy and wealth-producing industry and enterprise. This continued until credits became again unwisely expanded and speculation became rife.

THE PANIC OF 1857.

In 1857 I was the president of the bank in the State of Indiana, and this is a part of what I said about the financial troubles of that year in the report from which I have quoted:

"The financial crisis of 1857 was the result of a similar cause to that of 1837, namely, the unhealthy extension of the various forms of credit. But as in this case the evil had not been long at work and productive industry had not been seriously diminished, the reaction, though sharp and destructive, was not general, nor were the embarrassments resulting from it protracted. Now, in both instances, the expansion occurred while the business of the country was upon a specie basis, but it was only nominally so. A false system of credits had intervened, under which payments were deferred and specie, as a measure of value and a regulator of trade, was practically ignored. Everything moved smoothly and apparently prosperously as long as credits could be established and continued, but as soon as payments were demanded and specie was in requisition distrust commenced and collapse ensued. In these instances the expansions preceded and contraction followed the suspension, but it will be recollected that while the waves were rising specie ceased to be a regulator by reason of a credit system which prevented the use of it."

Now, with all due respect to Mr. Blaine, I express the opinion that the apparent prosperity which preceded the revulsion of 1837 and the real prosperity which preceded the crisis of 1857 were not caused by the tariff and that the reverses which followed were not attributable to its reduction. If the tariff was in any measure instrumental in producing the changes, it was in stimulating the expansion which terminated in disaster. In 1857 I was a believer in the tariff, and it never entered my head to attribute the financial troubles of that year to the changes to which it has been subjected.

THE FINANCIAL TROUBLES OF 1873.

The most pressing duty which I had to perform when I became Secretary of the Treasury in 1865 was to provide the means to pay the soldiers, and to meet other pressing demands upon the Treasury. This was done in the only way it could be done, by the sale of temporary obligations which had proved to be attractive to investors. After this had been accomplished the work of funding these obligations was commenced and carried successfully on until the whole amount—some thirteen hundred millions of dollars—was converted into bonds. While this work was going on I was under constant apprehension of a financial crisis before it could be completed. My apprehension was unfounded, but only as to time. The crisis was postponed, and for so long a period that the opinion generally prevailed that the vitality and productive power of the country were so great that the most expensive war that had ever been waged could be concluded, and great expansion of credit could be checked and abridged without financial disturbances. I have to confess that this was my own opinion, but the same causes which produced the crisis of 1857 were at work, and, as had always been the case, the revulsion came when least expected.

When I left London in September, 1873, to come to the United States, the financial skies, if not cloudless, were not threatening. The letters which were received by the London firm from its New York partners were encouraging; and I had no reason to expect anything but a pleasant visit to my old home, and a return to London under auspicious circumstances. But on the arrival of the steamship in the outer harbor I was met by the stunning intelligence that my American partners and the correspondents of the Fort Wayne banking house in which I was interested had failed; that all the banks except the Chemical Bank, which had weathered all storms, had suspended, and that one of the wildest panics which had ever occurred was raging throughout the country. The crisis was a terrible one. Although it came unexpectedly, it was only the consummation of influences which had long been at work beneath the financial horizon. In extent, in fierceness, and the disaster it resembled the revulsion of 1857. It was not, as Mr. Blaine states, brought about by the losses sustained in the civil war, which had been terminated eight years before, nor by the destructive fires in Chicago and Boston. Great losses may bring about what are called hard times—not panics. It was produced by an expansion of currency and of credits which fostered speculation, which rarely fails to terminate in financial troubles.

Follow what Mr. McCulloch says about early panics to that of 1893. The panic was over before the McKinley bill was repealed, though consequent depression lasted on for three years or more.

Remember the wild speculation and expansions of credits to the stretching point in the early and middle eighties; the "booms" all over the country about Birmingham, Sheffield, Fort Wayne, Chattanooga, in south West Virginia; in silver mines and boom towns out West. Remember the inevitable subsequent contraction of credits in 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892.

All of this—both speculation and contraction to cure speculation—and the consequent panic of 1893, occurred under the high protective tariff which bore Mr. McKinley's name, which was not repealed until August 17, 1894. We all remember the panic, soup houses, and Coxey's army marchings of that panic.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BURGESS. If you please.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KENNEDY] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak on postal savings banks, with special reference to H. R. 12209, introduced by me January 17.

In these modern days unorganized public sentiment is practically powerless. Almost every measure enacted into law has behind it an organization of some sort actuated by personal interest or profit. The Members of this House receive daily evidences of combinations to affect legislation, many of them being beneficial and some of them detrimental to the public welfare. The organized efforts put forth by capital and labor, and all classes of people, are directed mainly to the getting of money and not to the keeping of it. The present is a period of great prosperity and of great extravagance. The practice of economy is rare, except in those instances where circumstances compel it. The capacity to acquire wealth has been cultivated to the limit, but the habits of frugality, which aid in retaining it, are almost wholly forgotten. The Republican party has been largely instrumental in making the people prosperous. It should not now overlook the corresponding duty to aid in making them provident. The national banking system has amply provided for the needs of the rich and the commercial classes, but it has barely touched the poor and the people of moderate means. It is just as much the duty of the General Government to provide a system of savings banks for the toiling millions as it was to provide a system of national banks for the business interests of the country.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the people for whose benefit postal savings banks should be established can not bind themselves together and make their influence felt in Congressional campaigns. They must rely largely on the justice of their demand for such legislation. I am not unmindful of the fact that Congress does not lead, but follows, public opinion, and that the committees of Congress are reluctant to report important measures, except under the pressure of public opinion. It will be difficult, therefore, to get the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report favorably any postal savings-bank bill, and equally so to put it through this House. The sentiment in favor of such a measure, however, has grown rapidly of late, and must soon be reckoned with inside and outside of Congress.

SUBJECT NOT NEW.

This subject is not new to Congress. Almost sixty bills have been introduced within the last thirty years—about thirty-five in the House and twenty-five in the Senate. In 1881, on the request of the Postmaster-General, made at the instance of Representative Springer, of Illinois, James G. Blaine, then Secretary of State, sent to the diplomatic representatives of the United States stationed in foreign countries a circular letter requesting them to obtain from the several governments to which they were accredited, information touching the practical workings of postal telegraph lines, telephones, and postal savings banks, and report such information to the Department. As a result of that inquiry much valuable information was obtained and many reports transmitted. In February, 1882 (47th Cong., 1st sess.), Mr. Lacey, of Michigan, from the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads submitted a favorable report on H. R. 4198, providing for the establishment of postal savings banks, and fully, clearly, and concisely set forth the reasons why the passage of the bill was recommended. In February, 1891 (51st Cong., 2d sess.), Mr. Evans, from the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads submitted a favorable report, recommending the passage of a similar bill (H. R. 13404). In April, 1897, the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of State to send to the Senate any information in the possession of the Department relative to the various postal savings-bank systems then in operation in other countries.

In response to that resolution, in May, 1897, President McKinley transmitted a report which included many diplomatic and consular reports on the subject. In July of that year the Senate passed a resolution directing the Secretary of State to send to our diplomatic representatives abroad a circular letter similar to the one sent by Mr. Blaine in May, 1881, instructing them to obtain and transmit all possible information touching postal savings banks, postal telegraph lines, and telephones, such information to be sent to the Senate at the opening of the next regular session of Congress. John Sherman, then Secretary of State, acted promptly on the resolution, and during the spring of 1898 reports were forwarded by him to the Senate from twenty-six countries. These reports were published in Senate Document No. 39, second session Fifty-fifth Congress. They were uniformly favorable to the establishment and operation of postal savings banks. Fortified by these reports, in January, 1899 (55th Cong., 3d sess.), Mr. Butler and Mr. Mason, from the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, made a favorable report on a bill to establish a postal savings-bank system (S. 4747); which was made a substitute for seven other bills then pending in the Senate.

Postal savings banks have been recommended by six Postmasters-General of the United States. They were recommended by Postmaster-General Creswell as early as 1871, which recommendation he renewed in 1872 and again in 1873. Postmaster-General Maynard recommended them in 1880; Postmaster-General James, in 1881; Postmaster-General Howe, in 1882; Postmaster-General Wanamaker not only recommended them in three annual reports, but in 1891 he made a strong argument in favor of their establishment, and Postmaster-General Gary indorsed them in 1898. It appears, therefore, that for thirty-five years efforts have been made in this country to establish postal savings banks to receive the deposits of the masses without success. The friends of the system ought not to be discouraged, however, because it took more than fifty years of constant effort to establish them in Great Britain, where they had their birth, and where they have grown with the years in volume of business and in usefulness to the people. It is interesting to note the results in foreign countries.

Mr. DWIGHT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. DWIGHT. In the countries abroad where postal savings banks exist do they pay interest on deposits?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. DWIGHT. Do you know what rate?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes; I will speak of that more in detail as I proceed. Great Britain pays the lowest rate, 2½ per cent. It was formerly 3 per cent.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The credit for establishing postal savings banks in the first instance belongs chiefly to W. E. Gladstone. From 1807 for fifty-four years the public-spirited men of Great Britain had attempted to establish the system. In 1861 Mr. Gladstone succeeded in establishing it in England, and in the following year it was extended throughout Great Britain. The results speak for themselves more eloquently than any words of mine. The growth of the banks in Great Britain clearly appears from the increase of deposits and the rapidly increasing number of depositors. For the periods stated, from 1863 to 1905, both inclusive, deposits increased as follows, round numbers being used as a matter of convenience:

1863	$16,800,000
1867	48,000,000
1878	150,000,000
1882	200,000,000
1890	338,000,000
1895	490,000,000
1899	650,000,000
1905	750,000,000

There are now about 10,000,000 depositors in Great Britain, so that the average deposit is about $75. There are approximately 14,000 offices receiving deposits.

NEW ZEALAND.

Postal savings banks were established in New Zealand in 1867, and the following figures give the deposits at different periods from 1870 to 1904, both inclusive:

1870	$1,476,000
1875	3,636,000
1880	4,518,000
1885	8,190,000
1890	12,209,000
1895	19,477,000
1896	21,558,000
1904	36,000,000

CANADA.

Canada followed New England and established postal savings banks in 1868. The deposits at stated periods from 1870 to 1905, both inclusive, were as follows:

1870	$1,588,000
1875	2,926,000
1880	3,945,000
1885	15,000,000
1890	21,900,000
1895	26,800,000
1897	32,380,800
1900	37,507,400
1905	45,367,000

The average deposit in Canada is about $270. The rate of interest paid is 3 per cent, and was formerly 3½ and 4 per cent.

JAPAN.

Japan adopted the postal savings-bank system in 1875 and has reported deposits at certain periods from 1876 to 1896 as follows:

1876	$41,800
1881	822,000
1886	15,462,000
1891	20,000,000
1896	28,000,000

The average deposit in 1896 was under $23, the number of depositors being over 1,250,000. The rate of interest paid was 4 per cent.

FRANCE.

France established municipal savings banks in 1875, but her present postal savings-bank system was not established until 1881. In the fifteen years from 1881 to 1896 the deposits in these banks increased to $21,750,000, the number of depositors being over 400,000, and the average deposit over $50. These figures do not include the deposits in the municipal savings banks.

The French people are unusually thrifty and are excellent financiers. If the amount of their deposits in the municipal savings banks were added to the deposits in the postal savings banks, their capacity for saving and thrift would appear to be what it actually is—phenomenal. It is estimated that in France there is an account for every family.

GERMANY.

Germany has a municipal system of savings banks, of which the people avail themselves freely. Under that system the municipalities take the place of the General Government. The deposits, especially in the larger cities, aggregate enormous amounts. In Berlin alone there are over 500,000 accounts. Three per cent interest is paid on deposits.

OTHER COUNTRIES.

The following countries have adopted postal savings banks at the times stated: Belgium, 1869; New South Wales, 1871; Italy, 1876; the Netherlands, 1881; Austria-Hungary, 1882; Sweden, 1884; Cape Colony, 1884; Hawaii, 1886; Russia, 1889.

In 1896 Belgium had over 1,850,000 depositors, with deposits aggregating over $26,600,000. In 1904 the deposits amounted to nearly $110,000,000.

In 1896 New South Wales had on deposit in the postal savings banks over $21,800,000; in 1903, over $34,000,000.

At the close of 1895 Italy had 4,763 savings banks, with almost 2,900,000 accounts, and $90,000,000 deposits, the average deposit being over $30, and the interest paid on deposits, 3 per cent. In 1905 Italy had on deposit $195,000,000, the average deposit being $35.

In Austria-Hungary, at the close of the year 1896, the deposits in the postal savings banks amounted to $27,000,000; in 1903, over $36,500,000. The average deposit in that country is about $22.

In 1896 in Hawaii the deposits amounted to $730,350, the number of accounts being 7,494, and the average deposit over $97. The rate of interest paid on deposits was 4½ per cent.

It will be noted that in some instances the statistics bearing on the postal savings banks of other countries are not given for the last ten years. This is due to the fact that they are not accessible. Many of the figures used are those included in the reports made to the Secretary of State by our consuls stationed abroad under the resolution of the Senate adopted in July, 1897.

Believing that the House and the country ought to have detailed information on this subject covering the period from 1896 to the present time, I recently introduced in the House the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and has been favorably reported by that committee.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to send to the diplomatic representatives of the United States abroad a circular letter instructing them to obtain from the several foreign governments to which they are accredited as full information as possible touching the operation of postal savings banks, from 1896 to the present time, in the several countries which have adopted them; such information to consist chiefly of the aggregate amounts on deposit, and the aggregate number of depositors, at a stated date each year during the period aforesaid, the rates of interest paid, and copies of the present laws relating to such banks; the reports received in response to said circular letter to be sent to the House of Representatives at the opening of the regular session of Congress in December next, or as soon thereafter as possible.

The reports called for by the resolution would be made by our representatives abroad without expense to the Government, and it certainly can not be urged that correct statistics on a matter of such vital importance would injuriously affect Members of Congress and the country at large.

We have heard much and read much about our Government being of the people, by the people, and for the people. It is of the people and by the people, but with respect to its failure to establish postal savings banks it is not for the people. In this connection, the people I mean are the great masses, who are the real producers of wealth upon whom our material prosperity really rests.

In the light of the foregoing figures, it can not be successfully contended that postal savings banks have not been a success in other countries.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does your plan contemplate extending the postal savings-bank system to cities such as New York, where we have a thoroughly organized system of savings banks?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. My bill contemplates establishing postal savings banks in certain classes of designated post-offices throughout the United States, which would include post-offices in cities such as the city of New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Just one more question——

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I was going to add one thing more. I have in my bill an optional provision which leaves it to each State to say whether or not it will adopt the system. Under that provision, unless the State of New York should decide through its legislature to adopt it, the banks would not be opened in that State.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I should think that was a very wise provision. We are very proud of our savings banks in New York State. Could the gentleman tell me what effect, if any, this postal savings-bank system had in Canada on the private savings banks?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I shall be glad to tell you that in just a moment.

CONDITIONS FAVORABLE IN THE UNITED STATES.

It is quite usual, Mr. Chairman, for those opposed to postal savings banks to admit their success in other countries, but to assert that conditions are different here. In what respect are they different? Are they less favorable for the growth and development of the system? It may be said that the laboring people of other lands are more thrifty than our own. In a measure that is true, because thrift has been fostered in them by the several governments providing depositories for their surplus earnings. In this country wages are higher, and, provision being made for banks of unquestioned solvency, savings should be much greater per capita than in Europe. It is true that a larger proportion of our people of moderate means own their own homes, but that proportion would be immeasurably increased by the stimulus which postal savings banks would give to habits of thrift and economy.

It can not be said that private savings banks in Europe are less safe than similar institutions in our own country, because statistics prove the contrary to be the truth; nor can it be established that private banks are less accessible to the people in foreign countries, because the density of population over there tends to the opposite result. The conditions existing in Canada are not materially different from the conditions existing here, and yet postal savings banks have flourished in Canada from the date they were established, and they are considered to be and are an unqualified success. In 1870 they had on deposit $1,588,000, and since then $45,000,000 in deposits have been added. Human nature is quite the same the world over. Most men will provide for the future if they are sure of their savings in the end, but so long as there is an element of uncertainty about that, self-indulgence takes the place of self-denial and thrift becomes an unknown factor in the problem of life.

BONDS SUFFICENT FOR INVESTMENT.

It is frequently said that postal savings banks can not be operated successfully in the United States because there is no large or permanent national debt, and, therefore, no proper investment for the funds. A recent statement issued by the Treasury Department shows that the United States bonds outstanding, not pledged by the national banks to secure circulation, aggregate over $383,000,000. Statistics concerning the indebtedness of the several States of the Union, collected by me within the last few months, show that the aggregate amount of bonded indebtedness of the States is over $220,000,000. These bonds, national and State, aggregate over $600,000,000. The building of the isthmian canal will create a bonded indebtedness of at least $150,000,000. There would therefore be available for purchase at some price bonds aggregating $750,000,000, in which deposits in the postal savings banks could be invested. The present adequacy of this bonded indebtedness is apparent when we consider that the total deposits in the postal savings banks of Great Britain, after more than forty years, are $750,000,000, an amount not in excess of the national and State bonds available for our investments. It may be urged, however, that the United States as a nation does not contemplate a permanent bonded indebtedness. It is doubtful whether we will ever be entirely free from interest-bearing bonds. The construction of the isthmian canal is a great undertaking, and no man can foretell its effect upon international commerce. When that great work is completed the genius of the American people will find other undertakings of equal importance calling for the expenditure of great national wealth.

In addition to the United States and State bonds, there are hundreds of millions of dollars of municipal securities in which funds might be invested. These municipal bonds are for the most part of unquestionable validity, and would furnish a ready means for surplus investments.

WOULD NOT INJURE PRIVATE BANKS.

National banks are not now to any extent opposing postal savings banks, because they recognize the fact that they would not interfere with them in the conduct of their business. The opposition comes chiefly from savings banks charterd under State laws, or operated as private partnerships. It must be conceded that the Government should not undertake anything which can be done equally as well by private enterprise. If private banks can be so conducted as to supply the needs and merit and command the confidence of the people they are entitled to the business. So far as they are not safe, they can not command public confidence. During the period from 1865 to 1896 over 1,200 of our banks, other than national banks, failed. Their liabilities were $220,000,000, on which they paid in dividends $100,000,000, thus making the net loss in thirty-one years $120,000,000. The largest number of failures occurred in 1893. During that year there were 261, with liabilities of $46,766,800, on which dividends were paid amounting to $17,912,270, making the net loss $28,854,530 in one year. It will be noted that the average number of failures from 1865 to 1896 was about 40 each year. It will be conceded that from 1897 to the present time conditions throughout the country have been such that failures should have been few and far between, and yet from 1897 to 1905, both inclusive, there were 517 failures of banks, other than national banks, with liabilities aggregating over $123,361,000. The dividends paid out of these latest failures are not yet obtainable. It is safe to say that since the time postal savings banks were established in Great Britain the people of this country have lost by the failures of banks, other than national banks, the enormous amount of $200,000,000. It must be remembered, too, that this loss has not fallen upon the rich, but upon the people of moderate means and the extremely poor. It undoubtedly is true that a large number of these failures were due to mismanagement and dishonesty, and that by far the greater proportion of our State and private banks are safe and sound and well managed. We must admit, however, that we can not stand upon the record of the past and expect our people to place implicit confidence in all private savings banks, and a large proportion of the people will not discriminate, and so will not deposit in any of them.

In 1905 there were 1,237 savings banks in the United States, and the population at that time, as estimated by the Comptroller of the Currency, was 83,260,000. It will appear, therefore, that in 1905 there was only one savings bank to 67,300 people. The same year the capital stock of all the savings banks in the United States aggregated only $26,191,294, and the deposits in these banks were $3,093,077,357. In other words, the deposits were nearly 120 times the capital stock. The number of savings banks is not equal to the needs of the people, and the capital invested is no adequate protection to the people who deposit their money in them.

There is no reason why properly managed private savings banks can not compete successfully with postal savings banks. The average rate of interest paid by private banks on savings deposits is 3½ per cent. The average rate paid by the Government would not exceed 2½ per cent, thus giving the private banks the advantage of 1 per cent in the rate of interest. This alone would give a sound, solvent, and well-managed institution an advantage that could not be overcome. Then, again, the statistics and experience of other countries show that the postal savings banks have served as feeders for the private banks, and that both classes of institutions have grown side by side. The depositor in the postal savings bank begins with a deposit so small that his account is of no value to the private banker. When he has increased it by thrift and economy he becomes more confident of his ability to handle the fund, and he transfers his accumulation to the private bank, which pays him a higher rate of interest. This is the view taken of late by many of the building associations throughout the country. They now realize that postal savings banks would help and not hinder them. The fact that private banks flourish alongside of postal savings banks is amply demonstrated in Canada. Between 1900 and 1905 the postal savings bank deposits in that country increased less than $8,000,000. During the same period the chartered banks and private savings banks in Canada increased their deposits nearly $245,000,000. Well-managed private banks have nothing to fear, but much to hope, from postal savings banks.

Mr. GARRETT. Have you time to yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Just for a question.

Mr. GARRETT. I want to suggest this thought. The fundamental objection that I have seen so far to all the postal savings bank bills that I have examined is this: That they provide that the funds deposited shall be exempt from any sort of garnishment or execution from any State court. Now, I want to ask my friend if he does not think that is stepping rather far?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Yes; and my bill does not contain that provision.

Ten years ago, Mr. Chairman, the United States was the only civilized nation without a bankruptcy law, and now that the country has tried it, it will not be repealed in a hundred years. To-day the United States is the only civilized nation without a law providing for postal savings banks or Government savings banks of some sort.

Mr. SULZER. And if we ever get one it will not be repealed in a hundred years, either.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. The gentleman from New York is quite right.

WOULD EXPAND AND NOT CONTRACT THE CURRENCY.

It is frequently urged that the establishment of postal savings banks would tend to contract the currency. The contrary is true. In times of stringency and panic the people of moderate means withdraw their money from the private banks and hide it away in deposit vaults, beds, boots, and stockings, not to be deposited again until confidence has been restored. The money so withdrawn from the banks is withdrawn from circulation, and to that extent the currency is contracted. No panic would ever induce any depositor to withdraw his money from the postal savings bank. If postal savings banks were established and the panic came, depositors withdrawing their money from private banks would deposit it immediately in the postal savings banks, thus preventing to that extent a contraction of the currency. It has been argued that the Government would gather the deposits made in postal savings banks throughout the country and place them in Washington, New York, and other money centers. That would not be the case. The deposits would be invested, and pending investment, should be and would be kept on deposit in the particular localities from which they came. My bill, now pending, has a provision to that effect. Moneys invested by the Government under the postal-savings-bank act would at once find their way into the various avenues of trade and commerce.

Mr. FINLEY. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. I have only a few minutes, but I shall be glad to answer the question.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman stated a moment ago that national banks were not opposed to postal savings banks.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. That is my experience with them.

Mr. FINLEY. Why?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Well, one reason is that many national-bank officials believe that in times of panic private savings banks are a menace to the national banks. These savings banks have not the funds available for withdrawal in case of a run, and they know that as soon as they claim the right to require the notice to which they are entitled their credit and standing is impaired, and so they call upon the national banks for support, and to protect themselves the national banks give it to them to their own detriment. Another reason is that many national banks now recognize that postal savings banks would serve as feeders for them.

Mr. FINLEY. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks because of the fact that the Government deposits, sometimes more and sometimes less, in the national banks—placing money on deposit there—that in the case of the postal savings banks they would reap even larger benefits than they have in that respect? Has that anything to do with it?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. No, sir; I think not. Under the system which I have outlined in my bill, if they had any such expectation they would be disappointed, because that contemplates the immediate investment of the funds and provides that until they are permanently invested they go back to the locality from which they came, so as to prevent centralization.

Mr. FINLEY. But after an investment was made, then the funds would be centralized in the larger cities.

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. No, sir; not at all; because just as soon as the investment was made the money would pass out of the hands of the Government into the channels of trade and commerce.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman think that the establishment of postal savings banks under the system outlined in his bill would interfere to any great extent with the commercial banks of the country?

Mr. KENNEDY of Nebraska. Not at all, sir. I contend that it would help them, and not hurt them.

WOULD PROMOTE THRIFT.

When laboring men and people of moderate means lose their savings through insolvent banks, they lose more than the money; they lose the desire to save. The poor man who goes to sleep at night believing his hard-earned savings to be safe, and a protection against illness and old age, and wakes in the morning to find that they have been swept away in the night is unnerved and unfitted to make any further effort to save. He has lost confidence in all banks, and in a vague way he holds the Government responsible for its failure to protect him in the possession of his hard-earned dollars. Economy and thrift go hand in hand, each encouraging the other. The government which fails to encourage both fails to grasp its opportunity and falls short of its duty.

WOULD TEND TO MAKE LOYAL CITIZENS.

The mutual interest created between the United States and the depositor in postal savings banks would be beneficial to both. The citizen who looked to the Government to safeguard his savings would be more patriotic. Grateful for the security offered him, he would reciprocate by giving to the Government greater loyalty and more generous support. He would stand by the government that stood by him, and he would teach his children, with lessons of thrift and economy, the greater lesson of loyalty to the United States and reverence for and obedience to her institutions and laws.

Gentlemen must not forget that postal savings banks are intended to receive small deposits only. Any bill properly framed will limit the amount which any one person may deposit within a given time and limit the aggregate amount of his deposits.

The demand for postal savings banks in my district is emphatic and almost universal with the people for whose benefit they should be established. It is probable that the system will soon be put to the test in the Philippine Islands. Should it prove to be a success there, the way may be opened for it here. I shall be glad, indeed, if I may be able to contribute in the slightest degree to that result. Postal savings banks are necessary and desirable and would rapidly win their way to popular favor and support. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the time allotted me this evening in addressing myself to, and offering some observations upon what some people call "government by injunction" and its relation to organized labor, a subject that I fully appreciate is one considered by many as possessing great delicacy and always more or less embarrassing to those who undertake its discussion, and especially so to me in this great body of legislators. I had supposed until last evening that in this delicate undertaking I might be further handicapped by venturing upon the task as a sort of pioneer, and, Mr. Chairman, I confess to some sense of relief since last evening I had the pleasure, as did the House, of listening to a very able and pertinent discussion of this question by my distinguished friend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. Chairman, no argument however cunningly devised, no reasoning however refined or ingeniously contrived can avail to deprive a citizen of this Republic, when accused of crime or violation of any penal law of the land, of the right of trial by jury under the guaranties of the Constitution of our country.

The announcement of a proposition so fundamental and elementary is, I know, not calculated to challenge any special interest, if indeed it be not regarded a stale and commonplace platitude. But, sir, in view of certain conditions existing between that large class of our people known in our industrial life as employers and that other and still more numerous but less powerful class known as the employees—in other words, between capital and labor—and the frequent disagreements that have disturbed their peaceful relations and the urgent demands lately made by the latter for some remedial legislation in relation to their disputes and controversies, I have felt justified in calling brief attention to some of these demands and offering some remarks upon this subject. In doing this I am reminded that one of the chief evils of which complaint is made by the labor organizations—labor unions—and associations of the country, is the manifest tendency of some of our Federal courts and Federal judges in cases of disputes and controversies arising betwen these two opposing forces, to unduly extend the use of the writ of injunction and other high writs of equity jurisdiction, belonging exclusively to the chancery powers of such court, as a means of punishment for alleged offenses growing out of such disputes and controversies, thereby depriving the accused of the right of jury trial.

If, sir, there be any reasonable foundation for this charge or justification for this complaint, and the courts or judges have exceeded in this respect the wise and safe boundary line of their jurisdiction; have invaded the personal rights of the citizen by an unwarranted assumption of equity powers in cases not permitted, then I take it that their cause is not without merit and should find a willing disposition on the part of the Members of this House to correct such evil to the full extent of their power. I am, however, not unmindful of the fact that public clamor is sometimes hysterical and not always a safe and reliable guide to gauge public judgment on important questions. But in the case of these labor demands their lack of merit is certainly not so apparent as to justify a denial of respectful and dignified treatment. This is an age of organization, combination, and concentration. Never before in all our history have we witnessed a parallel in the rapid growth, development, and combination of corporate wealth, influence, and power in the various branches of industrial enterprise, and as these have multiplied and extended their dominion over almost every possible avenue of employment it is but natural, if not indispensable to self-preservation, that the laborer and wage-earner should likewise organize and combine to be able to meet and treat with their adversary upon anything like fair and equal terms.

But, sir, I shall not contend, nor do I believe any well-informed and intelligent member of any labor organization contends, that by virtue of organization the organization itself or any member of it becomes vested with the power to exercise any rights not lawful and permissible to every other citizen under like and similar circumstances. In view of these conditions and in response to the urgent demands of the labor organizations of the country, there have been introduced in this Congress several bills proposing to deal with certain phases of the questions involved, which have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I find among others H. R. 9328, introduced by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. GILBERT] on December 19, 1905, and H. R. 17976, introduced by Mr. HENRY of Texas, April 10, 1906. These bills purport to deal only with the question of granting restraining orders and injunctions in certain cases, and requiring notice prior to their issuance. These bills have been consigned to their death in some pigeonhole of the committee room.

Then there was introduced by request, as it purports, by Mr. PEARRE of Maryland, H. R. 18752, April 28, 1906, and it is to this one that I desire to call the especial attention of the House. This bill, however, like its predecessors, was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and not likely to survive a similar fate. But unlike the other bills to which attention has been called in this, that it does not undertake to deal with or to change or alter the practice with reference to notice in the issuance of these writs, but does undertake to limit the right to issue such writs in cases involving the relations of employer and employee, and employees, and to disputes concerning the terms and conditions of employment to such cases where irreparable injury is threatened to property or property rights of the party making the application, for which there is no adequate remedy at law. It further provides what shall not be considered a property right in the sense of the bill if enacted into law. It further provides in section 2 what shall not be held to constitute a conspiracy in cases arising in the United States courts or before any judge thereof in reference to labor disputes and controversies. This bill is brief, and I will read the same as part of my remarks. It reads:

A bill to regulate the issuance of restraining orders and injunctions and procedure thereon and to limit the meaning of "conspiracy" in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or between persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purpose of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or to carry on business of any particular kind, or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

SEC. 2. That in cases arising in the courts of the United States or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment of labor, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be punished or prosecuted as such unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual, nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done would be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations, and definition contained in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, as I am reliably informed, is the bill prepared under the supervision of the national federation of labor unions and was introduced in this House at this session at their request by the courtesy of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE]. The bill, I am told, has the unanimous indorsement and cordial support of all the labor organizations, as well as the nonunion men throughout the country and is one in which they have taken much interest and feel a deep concern. I myself have received some communications from these organizations warmly urging the passage of the bill. This demand coming from organized labor, numbering in its ranks more than 2,500,000 out of the more than 5,000,000 of the Nation's industrial toilers, should itself commend it to the favorable consideration of this House. I will insert as part of my remarks one of these communications and the resolutions accompanying it, from the Chicago Federation of Labor. It is as follows:

CHICAGO, May 28, 1906.

To the Honorable President, the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States.

DEAR SIR: We herewith submit to your consideration the inclosed resolution and petition passed by the Chicago Federation of Labor:

Whereas organized labor has for years protested against the abuse of the writ of injunction in labor disputes; and

Whereas we steadfastly maintain that any act which is lawful when committed by an individual can not be unlawful when committed by two or more persons; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the Chicago Federation of Labor, representing 250,000 organized workers in the city of Chicago, hereby respectfully request that the bill now pending in Congress known as the "Pearre bill H. R. 18752," be enacted a law at the present session of Congress.

Hoping to receive your support for this bill and awaiting your reply at your earliest convenience, we are,

Very truly, yours,

CHICAGO FEDERATION OF LABOR.

A careful analysis of this bill will show that it is the result of a studied effort to protect labor organizations against interference by the courts by writs of injunction in cases where property or property rights are not involved within the rules of equity and to prevent court construction of certain agreements into "conspiracies." Its provisions are clear and well drawn, and while covering questions not hitherto exploited in legislation, are yet conservative and do not reach beyond the safe boundaries of wise and prudent legislation if it be free from the objection of discrimination. It attempts to draw the line between those rights of the citizen which are subject to the equitable jurisdiction and control of the courts and those which are not; between those rights of labor and of the rights of members of labor organizations and combinations as individuals seeking and performing labor, and the rights of employers of labor. In other words, drawing the distinction between property rights and personal rights. For the difference between these mark the line of demarkation where the courts may or may not legally assume equitable jurisdiction and interpose their controlling power.

A confusion of ideas concerning what constitutes property rights, as contradistinguished from mere personal rights, must lead to a like confusion in the application of the principles of law when we come to deal with controversies and disputes involving the one or the other. A clear and distinct understanding, therefore, of the legal distinction between property rights and personal rights—and what constitutes the one or the other—and a like understanding of the difference between a lawful combination, organization, or association of persons and an unlawful one, are highly essential to an intelligent discussion and understanding of the questions involved and the proper remedies to be applied. Every well-informed and intelligent person must realize the far-reaching importance of these questions. If it were a mere matter of legal remedies and court procedure, it might be a much more simple proposition, but to confine ourselves to a discussion of the mere legal technical phases of the subject would be to confess our lack of capacity to comprehend the real merits of the controversy. It would be as absurd and impracticable as to construct a sewer without any regard to the volume and current of water to flow through its channel. This is a progressive and industrial nation, foremost among all the nations of the earth, and the welfare of all depends upon production—upon the joint operations of capital and labor.

As said by Mr. Thomas Carl Spelling in his very able argument presented to the committee, as counsel for the Federation of Labor, on this very bill, and I quote from his argument:

If we go back to the less complicated and primitive conditions prior to the advent of concentration of business, combinations, and associations, we find that even then capital was an organized force. But under the conditions of that early period in the expanding development of our country the necessity for the employment of large numbers of laborers had not yet arisen. The question of labor and the opposing forces of labor and capital are the concomitant incidents in the growth and evolution of our business enterprises. Until the demands of trade and commerce justified the employment of laborers in large numbers, we never heard of labor disputes and controversies, of strikes and lockouts. Take any community or neighborhood and let a man come into it with a large amount of capital to engage in a business requiring the employment of a large number of men and he is at once a potent factor, an organized force, and whatever he chooses to prescribe as a scale of wages will generally govern and control in that community in the absence of organization among laborers. And so we find it everywhere, and this condition and tendency is strongly accentuated by the advent of associations and combinations of capital in the form of corporations and trusts; and as one of the most inevitable consequences we find the question of wages, the scale of price to be paid for labor, always uppermost in the minds of these associated and related interests.

It does not matter whether it is a corporation having control of the production of a commodity or a combination of corporations in the form of a trust, the question of the price of labor is of first importance, because such a large per cent of the outlay consists of wages that a small reduction in the wage price means a large profit to the employer. Hence, with labor unorganized it is unable to cope with the inevitable tendency to depress and force wages down to the lowest possible level which will permit a bare subsistence.

Again I quote substantially from Mr. Spelling. He further said:

Another thing that ought not to escape our attention in the consideration of this industrial question—this continuous strife between capital and labor—for this is a practical age, and not the ideal age contemplated by The Hague Tribunal, nor crystallized in the theory of modern socialism, or reflected in the fanciful dreams of some philosophers, when there shall be peace and harmony between all nations, communities, and peoples—but a practical age, with practical men, dealing with practical problems; hence I therefore repeat what I have just said, that the other thing to be reckoned with is that we are now in the midst of a struggle, an irrepressible and incessant conflict, between capitalists, rival competitors for the volume of trade, not only at home, but in the broader field of international commerce, for foreign markets.

This intensifies, if it does not imbitter, the contending forces in this great world struggle. This conflict, as I have said, is inevitable; it is the logical sequence of the cupidity and selfishness of business and trade, and it is not unnatural, therefore, that the opponents of all legislation in the interest of labor to say that there ought to be peace, there ought be harmony; that there ought to be arbitration, even if under the strong coercion of law; but sir, as long as this abnormal condition exists between capital and labor, and between capital itself, there will be little hope of any successful effort to compel submission and enforce peace on the labor organizations. Until a reconciliation shall be had upon the broad and humane basis of live and let live, upon principles of economic justice between capital and labor, the resort to injunctions and restraining orders of Federal judges and Federal courts will be vain and futile.

Mr. Chairman, there no longer exists in the fair and unbiased minds of men at all familiar with our industrial history a doubt of the legal right of workingmen to organize and combine with a view, among other things, of getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, and they have the same freedom and liberty as organized capital has to support their interest by argument, pursuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they may lawfully control. If this were not true, if it were otherwise, then in the very nature of things, under existing conditions and the unavoidable warfare in the struggle between the two, labor in its hard and unequal struggle with its more potent and powerful antagonist would be rapidly driven to a condition of absolute servitude.

These views are not mere pipe dreams or vagaries of a disordered fancy, but the well-supported conclusions in the best reasoned opinions and judicial expressions of some of the highest courts and judges of the land. In the case of Vaughan v. Gunter (167 Mass., 92) Mr. Justice Holmes, now a distinguished member of the Supreme Court, then a justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in his opinion says:

It is plain from the slightest consideration of practical affairs or the most superficial reading of industrial history that free competition means combination and that the organization of the world, now going on so fast, means an ever-increasing might and scope of combination. It seems to me futile to set our faces against this tendency. Whether beneficial on the whole, as I think it is, or detrimental, it is inevitable, unless the fundamental axioms of society and even the fundamental conditions of life are to be changed. One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services and that of society, distinguished under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is potent and powerful.

Combination on the other is a fair and equal way, * * * if it be true that the workingmen may combine with a view, among other things, to getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, it must be true that when combined they have the same liberty that combined capital has to support their interest by argument, persuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they otherwise lawfully control.

The doctrine announced in this opinion of Justice Holmes has not, however, been accepted and acted upon by those of the Federal courts, and judges who have been content to follow the line of vicious precedents, which they themselves have built up, although the views of Judge Holmes have been frequently cited and referred to in subsequent cases by the highest courts of the country as expressing the correct rule. This is especially true in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company v. Ruef, 120 Federal Reporter, page 111, where the judge says:

And Judge Holmes, now of the Supreme Court, is often cited as giving expression to the correct rule in his dissenting opinion in the Massachusetts case hereinbefore referred to, and excerpts from his opinion are often cited.

Another very interesting case to which I desire to call attention is the case of Hopkins v. The Oxley Stave Company, reported in 83 Federal Reporter, page 912. I do this to illustrate the absurd reasoning of some of the Federal judges in their efforts to justify their unwarranted assumption of jurisdiction and arbitrary proceedings based thereon. This case is of special importance on this subject and in this connection, because of the nature of the subject-matter of the proceeding and its intimate relation to the questions under discussion. This was a boycott case. The plaintiffs in the case, the Oxley Stave Company, was not only an employer of nonunion labor at a reduced rate, but used and operated machinery in carrying on its business operations.

The facts show that it used saws to make staves, and they sawed across the knots and grain of the timber, and the staves they manufactured when put into a barrel would therefore break, and the barrels would burst in the hands of the merchants and great loss would ensue. And yet they advertised and carried on their campaign to sell their product with great industry and energy. Now, it seems that the union men throughout the West found out about this, and they resolved to do what a great many people say is "boycotting." And what do you suppose they did? This and this only: They met and investigated and informed everybody they knew, merchants and dealers in staves and barrels and in general merchandise, about the inferiority of these goods. It seems to have been conceded that the proof showed in the case that what they said about these goods was absolutely true. The court in its opinion said:

These men may do that as individuals, but when they combine to do it, not only is it a crime, but it is the power and the duty of a court of equity to enjoin.

And, pursuant to this finding, the judicial bludgeon of a Federal injunction was hurled against these defendants—as innocent of crime as the judge upon the bench. Think for a moment of a judge of a high court announcing as a principle of law that an act done by an individual is entirely innocent, but when done by several persons collectively becomes a crime subject to fine and punishment. Think of a court asserting such a doctrine as this, and making it the foundation for the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction in injunction proceedings. The only offense—the only crime of which these men could possibly have been found guilty—was the fact that they had told the truth and were members of the labor union, and this it seems was sufficient in the judgment of this Federal court to issue against them a Federal injunction. No rule—no principle of law known to criminal jurisprudence—made them guilty of anything else. To use the terse and apt language employed by the judge in the case already referred to—the case of the Union Pacific v. Ruef:

I can not understand how two lawful acts, or the lawful act by each of two persons, can make an unlawful act any more than I can believe that two ciphers can make a unit.

Such a doctrine as here proclaimed would have done credit to a tool of some despot under the reign of Charles the First, but is ill suited to the reign of law in American jurisprudence. Why, gentlemen, the present law upon the subject of conspiracy now upon our Federal Statute defines this crime in the following language:

If two or more persons conspire, either to commit an offense against the United States or to defraud the United States, in any manner or for any purpose, etc.

This law requires, as do all other laws upon the subject of criminal conspiracies, that the object and purpose of the agreement or concert of action shall be "unlawful" in order to constitute it a crime. Why, the English conspiracy and protection act of 1875 breathes a more enlightened spirit of broad and humane justice upon this subject than do our laws, if we are to accept the law as interpreted by some of our courts, and we would do ourselves credit by copying her example. This act provides:

An agreement or combination of two or more persons to do, or to procure to be done, any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employers and workmen shall not be punishable as a conspiracy if such act as aforesaid when committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime.

This is almost the exact language of the bill now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and which I most sincerely hope will at the next session of this Congress, if not at this, be taken up and considered, and with such amendments as may be found necessary, without destroying its substance, enacted into law.

Congress has already expressly recognized the purposes contemplated by labor combinations as lawful, and sanctioned their right to organize to carry them out, though not to the same extent as that of the English Parliament, yet has taken a decided step in advance in that direction. By the act of 1886, First Supplement, chapter 567, page 495, entitled "An act to legalize the incorporation of trades unions," I merely call attention to that part of the act defining the purposes for which such organizations may lawfully combine. It reads:

For the purpose of aiding its members to become more skillful and efficient workers, the promotion of their intelligence, the elevation of their character, the regulation of their wages and their hours and conditions of labor, the protection of their individual rights in the prosecution of trade or trades, the raising of funds for the benefit of the sick, disabled, or unemployed members of the families of deceased members, or for such other object or objects for which working people may lawfully combine, having in view their mutual protection or benefit.

And here again I will quote from the brief of Mr. Spelling before the committee. He said:

Now, the law of private corporations, whether the incorporators derive their authority under special or general laws, every lawful means—mark you, every lawful means—may be resorted to by the incorporators to accomplish the purposes of the incorporation and to effectuate the objects contemplated, and there is no court of equity in Christendom that has any power to enjoin or prevent them. If this be true in the cases of corporations, under what theory can it be insisted that in an effort to maintain wages, to promote their welfare, and to better their social and industrial conditions, and otherwise to advance the objects contemplated in their associations, that labor organizations have not the same right to employ all legitimate means to these ends. Have they not the right, then, if necessary, to declare a strike, to go out and persuade their strikers to remain firm, or even to persuade those seeking their employment or to replace them to desist? Have they not the right, if it advances their cause, to assist them with money, to give them sympathy and encouragement, to meet in their lodge rooms, or such other place or places, as may suit their convenience, to open up and furnish reading rooms, and other places of entertainment, to make speeches, and discuss topics of interest, if these proceedings are carried on and conducted in a peaceable and orderly manner?

Those acts, sirs, are but instances of the exercise of the liberty of free speech, and the right to peaceably assemble guaranteed by the Constitution of the land, and they have as much right to the enjoyment of these privileges as members of this House to stand here and address this body. And in doing these things in an orderly way they should be as free as we from the coercive power of the courts. But applying the doctrine announced in the decision of the court to which I have heretofore called attention—the case of Hopkins v. Oxley, etc.—these organizations and labor associations are denied many of these privileges and immunities, and are grossly and unjustly discriminated against in favor of corporations and the great aggregations of capital in the form of trusts. To illustrate the enormity of the doctrine announced by the court in this case, I merely call attention to the dissenting opinion in the case by Judge Caldwell, who covers the question more clearly, and much better than I can do. In this opinion Judge Caldwell says:

While laborers, by the application to them of the doctrine we are considering, are reduced to individual action, it is not so with the forces arrayed against them. A corporation is an association of individuals for combined action; trusts are corporations combined together for the purpose of collective action and boycotting; and capital, which is the product of labor is in itself a powerful collective force.

Indeed, according to this supposed rule, every corporation and trust in the country is an unlawful combination; for while its business may be of a kind that its individual members, each acting for himself might lawfully conduct, the moment they enter into combination to do that same thing by their combined effort the combination becomes an unlawful conspiracy.

Now, who will pretend to reconcile this logic, or justify the application of this rule, as made in this case? Yet the rule is so applied. I continue to read:

Corporations and trust and other combinations of individuals and aggregations of capital extend themselves right and left through the entire community, boycotting and inflicting irreparable damage upon and crushing out all small dealers and producers, stifling competition, establishing monopolies, reducing the wages of the laborer, raising the price of food on every man's table and of the clothes on his back and of the house that shelters him, and inflicting on the wage-earners the pains and penalties of the lockout and the black list, and denying to them the right of association and combined action by refusing employment to those who are members of labor organizations; and all these things are justified as a legitimate result of the evolution of industries resulting from new social and economic conditions and of the right of every man to carry on his business as he sees fit and of lawful competition.

On the other hand, when laborers combine to maintain or raise their wages or otherwise to better their condition or protect themselves from oppression, or to attempt to overcome competition with their labor or the products of their labor in order that they may continue to have employment and live, their action, however, open, peaceful, and orderly, is branded as a "conspiracy." What is "competition" when done by capital is "conspiracy" when done by laborers. No amount of verbal dexterity can conceal or justify this glaring discrimination. If the vast aggregation and collective action of capital is not accompanied by a corresponding organization and collective action of labor, capital will speedily become proprietor of the wage-earners, as well as the recipient of the profits of their labor. This result can only be averted by some sort of organization that will secure the collective action of wage-earners. This is demanded, not in the interest of wage-earners alone, but by the highest considerations of public policy.

This is the language of a judge of a distinguished court, speaking as we must, and have a right to assume, from an unbiased and disinterested standpoint and with that judicial calmness that befits his high station, and it would be difficult to make more clear and distinct the line of cleavage between corporate capital and organized labor.

In recent years the attention of the whole civilized world has been drawn to The Hague tribunal as the most encouraging omen of a world-wide sentiment in favor of promoting the peace of the nations that has ever occurred. However solicitous and hopeful the nations of the earth may look forward to the realization of this Utopian dream, and to all that has been accomplished in that direction, it must be confessed that we are still far removed from this ideal, for within six years from the date of the first assembling of that great world peace conference, the foremost nation in the movement found itself involved in one of the most gigantic and disastrous wars of modern times. No means in all the past has ever been devised to avert these conflicts and stop the shedding of blood.

Likewise in the struggles and conflicts in our industrial and commercial life in the strenuous competition now going on between the rival forces of organized capital to secure advantages in trade—in the markets at home and abroad—with this inevitable and irrepressible conflict going on, it would be marvelous indeed to expect that we will in the near future reach the point when the opposing interests of capital and labor will be harmoniously reconciled. But in the meantime these great economic factors in our industrial system should stand equal before the law, equal before the courts, equally responsible to both upon the same principles.

It is thought by some that workingmen constitute a turbulent and dangerous class of society and that their organization for mutual protection and betterment of conditions is a menace to good government, but in fact the wage-earners have been a steadying force in politics. Strong appeals and plausible arguments have been from time to time addressed to them to embark in hopeless efforts to readjust our systems of Federal and State government by the institution of impractical and far-reaching so-called "reforms,' such as greenbackism, populism, socialism and the like. But whoever else may have been led from paths of safety by such overturning attempts, it may justly be claimed to the credit of workingmen that they had wisdom and foresight sufficient to be forewarned of the folly of undertaking reforms otherwise than through the agency of one or the other of the two parties which existed and controlled every branch of Government for fifty years. In this way they have already accomplished much. They have secured the enactment of numerous statutes the enforcement of which has afforded relief from intolerable and unpleasant conditions, and in this way, if they correctly judge between their friends and opponents, organized politically, they may hope for much in the immediate future. Their numbers and their knowledge of party government are sufficient to enable them to take charge of and control either of the old parties and through such agency obtain any reasonable and just remedial legislation. Thus they may take a short cut to their ends and aims, whereas the third-party adventurers would lead them many miles astray without ever arriving anywhere. There have been in this country scores of third-party movements, not one of which ever accomplished anything of permanent value. Having elected candidates to public office, they were unable to keep them in office without a fusion or amalgamation with other parties. The same experiences are found when we come to examine the record of independent candidacies. It is an exceedingly rare combination of circumstances which results in the election of an independent, and when it happens it is usually found that he has promised so much that was impossible of performance that his administration is a disappointment to all. One reason for the failure of the independent candidate after his election is that, having opposed and censured the leading parties and their candidates, he finds the officials that have been elected by both or either arrayed against him from the start and at every turn. They hope soon to be able to secure from one or the other of the dominant parties the relief they seek, and they propose to keep a watchful eye upon the performances of both and judge for themselves which one has been most sincerely their friend, and the friend of the great body of the people, and to which they can most surely look for a realization of their hopes.

Labor organizations demand this and this only. They want no more. They will not be content with less. They do not plead for immunity from the pains and penalties of violated law. They are orderly and law-abiding. The tenets of their organization teach and impose as one of its first and highest mandates obedience to law. Every consideration of self-interest prompts, every consideration of policy and expediency constrains them to obey the laws of the country. In the brief examination given the subject I recall but one instance where they have applied to the court for relief. This was an application for relief in equity against what they charged was a conspiracy among employers of labor to blacklist and prevent their employment. The petitioners, workingmen, had quit the employment of the defendants, and they charged that defendants, their former employers, had blacklisted them and had engaged in a conspiracy to prevent their employment elsewhere by notifying other business firms and employers of labor of the fact that the petitioners were blacklisted. They sought an injunction against the defendants to restrain them from interfering with their employment and to remove their names from what they charged was the black list. The court held, the opinion being rendered by Chief Justice Field, of the supreme court of Massachusetts, that the petitioners were not entitled to relief. Case reported in 157 Mass., 423. In the course of the opinion the court uses this language—and it was a unanimous opinion:

> It is plain, however, that the petition was drawn with a view to obtain some equitable relief. It is well known that equity has, in general, no jurisdiction to restrain the commission of crimes or to assess damages for torts already committed. Courts of equity often protect property from threatened injury when the rights of property are equitable, or when, although the rights are legal, the civil and criminal remedies at common law are not adequate, but the rights which the petitioners allege the defendants were violating at the time the petition was filed are personal rights, as distinguished from rights of property.

It will be observed that the court, in deciding this case, draws the line of distinction between personal rights and property rights, as is recognized in all well-reasoned opinions of the courts everywhere. And with this decision labor organizations have expressed universal satisfaction, and all they ask is a like application of its principles to all other labor disputes and controversies. In the first section of the bill to which I have called attention provision is made to prevent the issuance of restraining orders or writs of injunction in any case of labor disputes or controversies, or matters of difference involving contracts, terms, and conditions of employment of labor, unless necessary to prevent "irreparable injury to property or to a property right" of the party or parties making the application, for which "injury" there is no "adequate remedy at law," and requiring the party or parties complaining to specifically and particularly describe the "property" or "property right" in the application, which is required to be in writing and sworn to by the applicant, or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. It is further provided by this section that no right to enter into contracts or agreements for the employment of labor or to create the relations between employer and employee, or the right to carry on business of any particular kind, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as "property" or as constituting a "property right."

The second section provides that no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment of labor or which create the relation of employer and employee or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving labor disputes, shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be punished or prosecuted as such unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be "unlawful" if done by a single individual, nor shall the entering into or carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done shall be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions of the first section.

These provisions contain nothing revolutionary—nothing beyond the scope of the law as it is now and has been defined, administered, and applied by the best legal writers and authors upon the subject, and the great majority of the highest courts of the land for more than a century of our history. Sirs, it may, and doubtless will, offer some vexation to those judges and courts—as the English juries did, in the reign of "court-made law" in that realm, who may be inclined to outride the wholesome restrictions thrown around their powers and jurisdictions by the Constitution. It is not unreasonable to suppose that a protest here and there will be raised, a criticism now and then made by the advocates and apologists of special privileges—of class discriminations. But even this opposition dare not challenge a fair and honest discussion of its motives.

No argument can be advanced, no reasons assigned, why this modest demand of labor should not be enacted into law, that may not be employed with equal, if not greater, force against many of the rights and privileges now claimed and freely exercised by the very interests arrayed in opposition. Labor unions and labor associations and their members are entitled to know what their rights are under the law, and to this end to have the law-making power of their Government to define what shall or shall not constitute a crime or public offense; and especially so in matters involving interest of the most vital concern to their personal rights and liberty. Under the present system, under prevailing conditions, no workingman can ever learn or know what rights, if any, he has. These rights with reference to his employer and the relation he sustains to his fellow-workman, whether as a member of the union or otherwise, depend entirely, it seems, upon the individual point of view of the judge who may happen to preside over the court before whom he is arraigned. One judge will issue an injunction or restraining order, holding that the acts charged in the complaint or bill are unlawful; another judge comes upon the bench and grants a motion to dissolve upon the ground that there are no acts charged against the defendants which they had not the absolute right to do.

Upon this whole subject I cheerfully commend to those feeling an interest in this question the splendid argument made by Mr. Spelling before the committee on April 26, 1906.

One judge holds that an act innocent, and therefore entirely legal when done by one person, is still legal if done by a number of persons acting in concert, while another judge holds that the number of persons participating makes the act illegal, while still a third holds that the number does not make the act illegal unless it is so great that of itself it amounts to force or intimidation. One judge holds that motive and intention do not per se make an act illegal; another holds that an act otherwise lawful becomes criminal and unlawful if done from malicious motives and with the intention of doing harm to another. So that in this confusion of judicial ideas and diversity of opinions ranging at will throughout the broad domain of judicial discretion claimed and exercised by the judges and courts, there must necessarily exist a dangerous power which, if not restrained by statute, is always liable to be prostituted to the subversion of the rights of the citizen. It is against the abuse of this power that labor protests, and insists that some measure shall be enacted restraining the use of the writ of injunction and other extraordinary powers and processes of the equity jurisdiction of Federal courts and judges to their legitimate functions.

Sirs, our fathers in their wisdom, fresh from the fields of carnage where they had fought and won the struggle for our liberties, provided for three distinct coordinate departments of government—the legislative, the executive, the judicial—and made each of them independent of the other and of supreme and exclusive jurisdiction within their respective spheres. In that masterly statement of their grievances against the Government of King George, which they esteemed sufficient to justify armed resistance, they recalled those words that more than any other fired the hearts of the American patriots and nerved them for that mighty conflict:

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws. He has in many cases deprived us of the benefit of trial by jury.

Smarting under these grievances, the people of the United States, under the lead of Thomas Jefferson, took the precaution to place it beyond the power of any department of the Government to subject any citizen "to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws" or to deprive any citizen "of the right of trial by jury." This was accomplished by inserting in the Constitution of the United States these plain and unambiguous provisions:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury."—Constitution, article 3. "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger."—Constitutional amendment, article 5. "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury. * * *"—Constitution, article 6. "In suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved."—Constitution, article 7.

These mandatory provisions of the Constitution are still vital and are not to be nullified and set aside by opposing them with the citation of a small horde of musty equity maxims and obsolete precedents originating in a monarchical government with no written constitution. No argument or reasoning can avail to deprive the citizen accused of a crime of his right to a trial by jury, guaranteed to him by the provisions of the Constitution, except in cases arising in the land and naval forces, and in the militia when in actual service in time of war or of public danger. These exceptions recited in the Constitution emphasize the right of trial by jury in all other cases. No other or different exceptions can be interpolated into that instrument at the instance of any interest or department of the Government. It is true, sir, that the right to change, alter, or even abolish government may be exercised by the people, and in the language of the Declaration of Independence, "establish a new one, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them might seem most likely to effect their own safety and happiness." But, sirs, it will be observed that this power was not delegated to any one of the three separate departments of the Government, nor to all combined; it was not delegated to the Federal courts or Federal judges nor any other agency of government, but was by express language reserved to the people.

Sir, in these latter days of colonial exploitation and commercial greed we chafe under constitutional restrictions, and the dangerous tendency is everywhere manifest, not only in the different departments of the Government, and in some of our highest courts, but in the heads of the departments and subordinate bureaus of the executive branches of the public service to break away from the safe and wholesome limitations defining their boundaries. These evidences are manifest in the fraud orders issued by the Post-Office Department prohibiting the use of the mails to any citizen or business who may be suspected or believed to be using the United States mails for fraudulent or illicit purposes, and this without a day in court or the right of trial to determine the facts or inquire into the truth of the matter charged against the party to be affected. The decision of the Postmaster-General in these matters, whether right or wrong, is, under the present practice, made conclusive upon the parties. This, Mr. Chairman, is too much power to vest in the hands of any one man, or in any administrative or executive department of the Government, and there should be some relief from this autocratic rule of governmental departments, and if it can not be otherwise accomplished, then some proper legislation should be had to that end. Again, sir, it is a matter of common knowledge and within recent recollection that executive influence and suggestions have been interposed to mold and shape the course of legislation of recent date, and, sir, without regard to the wisdom of such suggestions, the propriety of this course upon the part of the President has challenged the severest criticism and resentment.

Many instances might be cited—indeed, Mr. Chairman, have been eloquently portrayed by other gentlemen upon this floor during this session, equally vulnerable and open to criticism. But, sir, I will not further digress. If this bill is passed it will not deprive the courts of any of their equity powers. It will not interfere with the exercise of these powers through the aid of any of the great writs incident to such courts. I would not wish, sir, to countenance any proposition that would impair, or likely impair any of the well-established and well-recognized powers or functions of our courts. I would not consciously advocate here or elsewhere, or support any measure that would hamper, cripple, or in any way destroy the highest efficiency of the courts. I will allow no man to excel me in paying tribute to the generally high character of our courts—their distinguished ability and integrity. I would do nothing to detract from the high respect, confidence, and esteem in which the judiciary of our country has always been held. It is because of this high sentiment of regard for our courts and the general honesty and integrity of our judges that I would favor any measure calculated to safeguard and maintain their standing. And, sir, it is no attack upon the courts nor upon the judges to undertake by such a measure as this to define in a negative way what class of rights shall not be the subject of equitable jurisdiction and to define in terms and language that will leave no discretion in the judge or court in applying the law and drawing the line between "personal" and "property" rights, and between "agreements" that are "lawful" and "agreements" that are "criminal conspiracies."

Every case withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the law courts and included in the equity jurisdiction of the courts involves a denial to the parties of the right of jury trial. This is in derogation of the fundamental rights of the citizen and contrary to the genius of our whole system of jurisprudence, and unless demanded by the stern requirements of the principles of equity should not be permitted. I maintain that those decisions of the courts in which it is held that the mere right to carry on and conduct a business is a property right; that the employer has a property right in his workman, and that the right to labor is a property right in the sense that they confer upon a court the right to issue a restraining order or injunction to protect them from threatened interference by others are not supported by the weight of, but, on the contrary, they are in conflict with and opposed to the great weight of authorities; and yet these are made in many instances the sole ground upon which the courts have predicated their right to issue injunctions. These are the character of cases that have given rise to that peculiar jurisdiction of our courts denominated "government by injunction." Sir, as long as our courts and judges are capable, upright, and thoroughly honest we need have but little fears for the safety of our country. The great body of the people upon the one hand with the corrective power of the ballot, and honest and pure courts upon the other who have final supervisory power over all other branches of the Government may be safely relied upon to maintain the integrity and purity of our republican institutions and preserve the heritage of our liberties for centuries yet to come.

But, sirs, if there be one privilege that is held more sacred than another—esteemed more highly essential to the preservation of liberty—it is that of the right of trial by jury. So jealous of this right were the founders of our Government that they were unwilling to intrust the protection of the citizen to any other tribunal than that of a jury impartially selected from the body of the people in all matters vital to his personal liberty. Jefferson in his first inaugural address, in announcing the essential principles of our Government, among other things, said:

> A jealous care of the right of election by the people—a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped off by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; * * * freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus and trial by juries impartially selected.

Hence it is neither strange nor an evidence of hysteria when symptoms of unrest and disquietude prevail among a large number of that class of worthy and deserving citizens who are honestly persuaded to believe, and do believe, that there are abuses in the use of these extraordinary writs by some of our courts in the exercise of their equity jurisdiction when employed in labor disputes.

Sir, in this connection it may not be unprofitable to recall some examples in English history from which we of this generation, as did our ancestors more than a century ago, may draw some lessons of instruction and wisdom. It is said that history repeats itself. No citizen of this Republic wishes to see the history of other republics that have preceded us, whose institutions were once the pride and glory of their citizenship as ours is with us, repeated in this fair domain of God's universe. No one at all familiar with the sources of corrupting power that led to the ultimate overthrow of all the republics of ancient times, will fail to discover the operation of influences here that so materially contributed to these mournful pages on which is written the tragic story of their departed glories. But, sirs, these warnings of history should but serve to quicken the public conscience, and spur to renewed energy and watchfulness, every citizen of the Republic. As Jefferson said:

> If there be those among us who would wish * * * to change our republican form of government, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.

If there be those among our courts or judges who would endanger our system of jurisprudence by denying a citizen when accused of crime of his constitutional right to a trial by jury, let a courageous protest be made and remedial legislation enacted. The English people owe to the English jury more than to any one other agency the preservation of their rights and liberties as guaranteed in the Magna Charta.

They stood as the great bulwark of protection to the common people as against the aggressions and usurpations of the Crown and his dependent and servile judges. A few examples will serve to illustrate. William Penn and William Mead espoused the Quaker faith, which was offensive to the King and the ruling classes. Mr. Penn and his followers had erected a small and modest church edifice in the little town in which he resided, where he and Mead and those who held to their belief were accustomed to meet on Sundays for worship. On one Sabbath morning, when the little congregation had assembled at this church house to hear Mr. Penn preach, he found the door closed against him.

With that characteristic spirit of humility of the Quaker faith, Mr. Penn and his friends retired to a suitable place near by, where Penn began to preach to his followers, but he had scarcely begun when the police swooped down upon them, broke up the meeting, and dispersed the assembly. Instead of the real culprits who had disturbed the meeting, Mr. Penn and Mr. Mead were arrested and dragged before the court and were charged with a criminal conspiracy to disturb the public peace, by the "agreement," as was charged in the "indictment," between Penn and Mead to hold a meeting in a public place to preach. Mr. Penn was arraigned before the judge, and as under the common law at that time the defendant was entitled to a jury when charged with a crime, a jury was impanelled, and they were placed upon their trial, but denied the aid of counsel by the court. When confronted by the judge and jury and required to plead to the indictment, Mr. Penn, protesting his innocence, demanded to know of the judge under what law he was being prosecuted. The judge replied that he was being tried under the common law.

Penn insisted that this was not a sufficient answer to his request, and again asked the court to point out to him the particular law that he was charged with violating. And the judge, evidently growing impatient at what he regarded as impertinent in a prisoner at the bar, remarked that he did not feel called upon to go back through the common law of England to specify the particular law with the violation of which the prisoner was charged merely to satisfy his curiosity, and Penn again repeated that if he was charged with the violation of the common law he thought it was of such long standing that the judge could, without trouble, point out that part of it charged to be violated. At this the judge flew into a passion, and with noticeable emotion preemptorily ordered Mr. Penn to be placed in the bailiff's dock. As the court bailiffs were in the act of forcibly carrying Penn from the bar of the court he turned to the jury and said, "I charge this upon your consciences; you, the jurors, my sole triors, that unless the laws of England—laws that make no discrimination on account of religious beliefs—are upheld, maintained, and enforced, then the coat upon the back may not be claimed."

With this, his last appeal, he was removed from the bar to the bailiff's dock. The trial proceeded and when the case was submitted to the jury, the judge upon the bench in his instructions said to the jury, "that he must be permitted to say to them that the charge against the defendant was a 'criminal conspiracy,' and they should find their verdict accordingly." The jury retired in charge of the bailiff, and after deliberating over night, the next morning returned their verdict into court finding the defendant guilty only of "preaching." Upon returning this verdict the judge severely rebuked the jury, and immediately ordered them to retire to their jury room and to return a verdict according to the instructions of the court. They did so, and returned into court for the second time their verdict of not guilty; the judge not only admonished them of their violation of the instructions of the court and the law, but again sent them back to the jury room with the threat that if they did not find the defendant guilty, he would be obliged to find them for contempt. The jury, however, refused to be browbeaten and intimidated and again returned into court their verdict of not guilty.

The judge, out of humor and indignant at their insolence, at once fined each of the jurors for contempt; and but for the higher court to which they appealed reversing the judgment, the court holding that the jury did nothing more than they had the right to do, these jurors would have had to pay the fine or suffer imprisonment. Here we have an example of the heroic devotion of the English jury to the cause of English liberty and the rights of man, standing between the frowning despotism of a judicial tyrant and its would-be victims. And thus was vindicated the liberty of conscience and the right of public assemblage. But for the patriotism, courage, and loyalty of an English jury, William Penn might have languished in an English prison instead of having founded in this Western Hemisphere a great city and a great sect, with whose history his honored name and fame will ever be associated.

A bookseller, among whose publications was found a criticism of the administration of public affairs, was arrested and dragged before the court and there charged with a criminal libel. It is said by the historian in speaking of this case that although Lord Ellenborough, with his splendid powers as an advocate, reenforced with the sympathy of the court and the influence of the court officials, as the crown counsel he failed to secure a verdict of conviction from the jury trying the case.

In a burst of impassioned forensic eloquence, standing with a copy of the libel act in his hand, he said to the jury that "by virtue of the authority of this 'act,' and upon my conscience and duty to God, I say this is a most flagrant and profane libel, and you should find the defendant guilty." But the jurors were not persuaded by the eloquence of advocacy nor overawed by the power of the court to surrender their convictions. The two judges sitting in the case both took occasion to say to the jury in turn "that the charge against the defendant was a libel, and they should so find," and the associate judge admonished the jury "that so long as he was not molested in his private affairs the private citizen had no concern to write and speak upon public matters." The jury, however, true to their consciences and loyal to their convictions, returned a verdict of not guilty, for which they were reprimanded and criticised by the judge in not following the instructions of the court. And thus was vindicated by English jurors the freedom of the press and the cardinal right to criticise the administration of public affairs. Again, seven eminent and distinguished bishops presented to the King a respectful and dignified petition praying for the enforcement of the laws of England and for certain reforms therein set out.

For this these bishops were arrested and charged with "seditious libel" and arraigned before a judge and jury for trial The judge of the court before whom they were tried instructed the jury that the defendants were guilty of the crime charged against them and peremptorially directed that a verdict be returned accordingly. The jury again refused to surrender to the dictates of judicial usurpation and returned their verdict for the defendants. The court declined to accept this verdict upon the ground that it was a violation of the instructions of the court and of the law of the land. The jury were threatened with punishment and sent back to the jury room to further consider their verdict, and after being sent back to their jury room two or three times they still held out and persisted, and finally declared they would not yield if they famished in the jury room; the judge seeing the utter folly of attempting to further coerce these sturdy, honest, and courageous men into a surrender of their love of liberty and sense of justice, finally condescended to accept their verdict and discharged the defendants. And this verdict was welcomed with expressions of joy and unbounded enthusiasm throughout the Kingdom, and was echoed from the remotest parts of the realm. And thus was vindicated the right of petition for redress of grievances.

These four great fundamental rights—the spoil of English jurors from English tyranny—constitute the corner stones of the American Republic, and must be preserved and perpetuated if we shall continue to enjoy the priceless heritage of free government. Our American juries are equally as patriotic, honest, and courageous as were the English juries, and fully as capable as were they of protecting the rights and liberties of the people, and have more than justified the wisdom of our fathers in making this institution so prominent a feature of our judicial system.

Sirs, it is recorded by an accredited historian that it was this unwavering attachment and loyal devotion to the principles of a free constitution that raised ancient Rome from her humble beginnings to that summit of happiness and glory to which she attained; that it was the loss of this that hurled her from that summit to the abyss of infamy and slavery; that it was this that inspired her senators with wisdom; that it was this that glowed in the breast of her heroes; that it was this that stood guard over her liberties, extended her dominions, gave peace at home, and commanded respect abroad. That when this decayed her magistrates lost their reverence for law and degenerated into petty tyrants and oppressors; her senators, forgetful of their dignity and debauched by public corruption, betrayed their country; her soldiers, unmindful of their relations with the community and urged only by the hope of public plunder and rapine, unfeelingly committed the most flagrant enormities and with unrelenting fury perpetrated the most cruel murders, whereby the streets of Rome were deluged with her noblest blood.

Thus the proud empress of the world lost her dominions abroad, and her inhabitants growing dissolute and abandoned, at length became consenting slaves.

And Rome passed away, an object of the derision and scorn of all succeeding nations; an everlasting monument to that world-wide truth, that eternal vigilance is the price of all liberty.

Yes, sirs, Rome was changed from a republic to an empire. The Roman eagles, once held aloft by the sturdy hands of freemen at the head of victorious legions, fell into the nerveless grasp of serfs and slaves, and, torn and rent into waring factions and predatory bands, became the easy prey of their own folly—spoliations and plunder. Deeply embedded in the very core and center, web and woof, of her tragic history, running like a thread through all its shifting scenes and changing forms, were the fundamental principles of human right and of human liberty. It was the initial test, as it were, of the capacity of man for self-government. At the supreme moment of her greatest prosperity and apparent security came the crucial ordeal of her vitality and strength. In the struggles of her adversity she had expanded, grown—gathered strength, power, and national renown.

In the plenitude of her power and vaunted glory she fell. The most instructive lessons to be drawn from the history of her rise and fall are those that illustrate the influences that produced these two opposite results. We have in the suggestions already referred to a brief summary of the general causes that contributed to the catastrophe of her final and ultimate downfall. And yet, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact well understood with the student of history that the most potential factor in the beginning of this work of destruction, the most effective agencies contributing to this end, was the abuse of the powers of the Roman tribunes, as all inordinate powers are abused—the abuse of the use of the writ of injunction and other high prerogative writs of that court. First employed to prohibit, then to command, then to coerce, then came the Emperor. The people, harassed, worn out, and overawed by the vexatious annoyances and oppressions through these agencies of arbitrary power and judicial usurpation, were finally broken in spirit and yielded submissively to their hopeless fate, crying out as with one voice, Ave Emperator. Then arose Carl the Great, who became first Emperor of the Roman Empire in the Middle Ages. The gradual but ever dangerous and insidious encroachment, extension, and usurpation of the power to enjoin and prohibit ripened into and became the undisputed power of one man to legislate, adjudicate, and execute.

The end was soon to follow. Of all the sinister influences that menace the Republic and threaten the liberties of the people, there are none more to be dreaded, none to be more jealously guarded against than judicial encroachment and judicial usurpation.

Rome, imperial Rome, that from her throne of beauty, grandeur, and glory once ruled the world; Athens, from whose seat of culture and fountains of knowledge poured forth that perennial stream of erudite philosophies and learning that enriched the literature of the age and lifted the civilization of the world to a higher plane; and Venice, more beautiful than all her rivals, to and from whose marts and ports, came and went, convoys of the world's commerce, whose sails whitened every sea, and to whom the waves sang hosannas. These, Sirs, have all perished from the face of the earth. But they perished not from foes without; not from invasion of Goth or Hun or Vandal, but from internal decay; from moral and political corruption from within; from debauchment of the public conscience; from a betrayal of all the powers of government into the hands of the few; from the accumulation of excessive and idle wealth in the hands of the plutocratic classes; from riotous and voluptuous living, and all the vicious brood of destroying and demoralizing influences following in their wake.

These, sir, were the fountain sources of corruption from which emanated the noxious poisons that planted the seeds of dissolution and decay in the body politic of these ancient but once proud and powerful republics of the past. In the shifting scenes of this transformation—these national tragedies—the people were deprived of their liberties and reduced to beggary, want, and servitude. Political preferment and places of public trust, no longer the just reward for honest merit, were sold on the auction block to the highest bidder in the open market places. All positions of honor and stations of power became the spoil of wealth and the coveted prize of the most venal and corrupt, and these purchases of wealth were utilized as so many additional agencies in the hands of these servile tools to still further oppress and enslave the masses.

Sir, I am not a pessimist, and do not sympathize with those whose visions are focused on the political horizon, intent in discovering some omen of political disaster in the near or remote future. I prefer, sir, to cast my lot with that more numerous and congenial company—with the great majority of strong, bouyant, and hopeful American citizens whose visions are turned to the rising sun, and whose delight it is to survey the present and contemplate the future with the confident assurance that American patriotism, statesmanship, and courage are equal to any emergency that may now or in the future confront our beloved country, and to wisely deal with any situation that may for the moment appear to threaten the stability and peace of our social order and the supremacy of law—the chief if not the sole reliance for the safety of our institutions.

With an unsurpassed record of achievements in the past; with the increased strength and added prestige of a successful and satisfactory solution of the most difficult problems that ever challenged the wisdom or taxed the resources of a great nation, to our credit; having advanced to the forefront, and holding the primacy among all the nations of the earth; with an external trade exceeding $3,000,000,000, and a domestic commerce exceeding $26,000,000,000; with a public domain and undeveloped national resources unsurpassed in the world's history; with an industrial system that produces annually hundreds of millions in excess of our capacity to consume, there seems no valid or adequate reason why our people should not be happy, contented, and prosperous. If there be just and reasonable grounds for the assertion of the wage-earners and workingmen that they do not in all cases receive a fair and just proportion of the profits of their labor, and are not dealt with in their labor disputes and controversies upon the same high plane of justice as that of their employers, this is not so much the fault of the laws as of their abuse in administration, in the one case, and of the hardened greed and avarice of the employer in the other. In either case I want now and here to declare not only my willingness to support, but to use my best efforts to promote, such measures of legislation within constitutional limits as shall secure to labor and to labor organizations their just legal rights.

To this end I shall insist that H. R. 18752 shall be taken up and reported out of committee to this House at the very earliest opportunity and then considered here, where its merits may be fully discussed and members may have an opportunity of voting upon it. There is nothing in this bill that should not command in my judgment the willing support of every friend of labor. This large class of our most worthy and deserving citizens have received but scant recognition at the hands of Congress. They have not been overzealous in pressing for legislation, and with rare exceptions have always been exceedingly conservative. I listened a few days ago with much interest to the very able and eloquent speech of my distinguished colleague from Indiana [Mr. C. B. LANDIS], as he portrayed the virtues of the protective tariff policy of the Republican party and the sacred schedules of the Dingley law. I was also delighted to hear a few days later on this same subject the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the most eloquent and able champion upon the floor of this House of this his favorite subject. Both of these gentlemen, as do all Republican advocates of protection, spent a good portion of their time and devoted a good part of their speeches to the laborer and the benefits afforded to the laboring men of this country by the protective policy. In fact almost the sole reason assigned for their support of this policy was the benefits it gave to the labor of the country. I shall not attempt here to discuss this matter. It is entirely foreign to the subject of my speech; but I had some wandering curiosity to know, and the thought occurred to my mind at the time, how these gentlemen stood upon the subject of protecting labor and labor organizations against the unwarranted interference by "Government by injunction" with the rightful and lawful efforts of the great labor organizations of the country to secure fair treatment and a fair wage from their corporate and trust employers, who above all other interests have shared the favors of the stand-patters, and have amassed fortunes beyond the dream of avarice. I seriously question if either of these professed champions of a strictly partisan policy would so willingly come to the rescue of the wage-earner and laboring man in a contest where they can not use him and the sentiment such appeal invokes in behalf of their party and partisan politics.

If so, they have neither of them thus far exhibited any symptoms of such inclination by speaking out in protest, or offering any such assistance, notwithstanding several bills have been pending for several terms of Congress asking for some relief of this kind, and none yet reported. If, however, it should be that either one or both should favor such a measure it may safely be assumed that their party are not friendly to the bill, and will more than likely save them from any test of their sincerity. I was also highly entertained, as was the House, by the tribute paid to the achievements of our country and its marvelous prosperity under the Republican party.

I heartily joined them in their expressions of eulogy and felt a thrill of pride in the captivating picture drawn of our greatness, our grandeur, and glory as a nation. But I confess I was so simple-minded as to think that they should have been generous enough to have given to the Almighty, at least in small part, some of the credit for all this national abundance. It occurred to my poor way of looking at things that at least some importance should have been given to the rains, the sunshine, the seasons, and in small degree some allowance made for the climate and soil. I thought perhaps there might have been in some mysterious way associated with these national blessings the natural resources of our wonderful country—of our mines of gold and silver, coal and other ores, and the energy, industry, and intelligence of a highly civilized and progressive people. But in all this we were evidently in error in these mental cogitations. It was all due to the "tariff" and the "fossilized stand-patters."

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the achievements that have made us the foremost nation of the world—the marvel of the ages—are the fruits of the policy of protection, nor of any policy or policies of government. I do not believe the chief glory of this country consists of the achievements of the Republican party, nor any other political party or parties. I do not believe it consists of its Army and Navy, with all their illustrious annals of glorious achievements upon land and sea. I do not believe it consists in its more than $3,000,000,000 of international trade and of its more than $26,000,000,000 of interstate commerce, stupendous and great as they are. I do not believe it consists of its imperial domain and the vast extent of its agriculture, nor of its fields, its forges, and factories; its mines and its mints; its great captains of industry and kings of high finance, nor all of these combined.

Mr. Chairman, the chief glory of our nation—the brightest gem in the jeweled crown of this Republic—is its more than 80,000,000 of a homogenous, cultured, honest, industrious, and patriotic citizenship, whose genius, skill, and ability challenge the admiration and command the respect of the world. And that among these, and the pride of all, is that noble band of brawn and brain—that splendid army of over 5,000,000 of American wage-earners and industrial toilers in the manufacturing industries of the nation, and that still greater army of over 20,000,000 engaged in other fields of manual labor, the bone and sinew of the land, the inspiration, hope, and mainstay to our industrial fabric and economic life in time of peace and chief reliance in time of war. These, sir, constitute my conception of the chief and overshadowing greatness, grandeur, and glory of this Republic, so beautifully described by Sir William Jones that I quote his words:

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Whose low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;
No; men, high-minded men,
Whose minds are as far above the brutes
Endowed, as brutes excel cold rocks
And brambles rude, in forest break or den;
Men who their rights and duties know,
And knowing dare maintain,
Present the long-aimed blow,
And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain;
These constitute a State.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to conclude his remarks. I will ask that he be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. PAYNE. I object to that. It is now 11 o'clock.

Mr. ZENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. PAYNE having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19750 and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20290) to amend the river and harbor act of March 3, 1905, reported it without amendment.

KENTUCKY RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BERRY. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20287) to authorize George Hammons, Charles Vaunice, and F. A. Lyons to construct a bridge across Kentucky River at Beattyville, Ky., to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr, BLACKBURN. The bill just reported from the Committee on Commerce is of considerable local importance. It is a House bill, unanimously reported from that committee, and I ask the Senate to allow it to be considered at this time.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. BERRY. I am diretced by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20409) to authorize the Minneapolis, St. Paul and St. Mary Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Red River, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that after the order of reports of committees has been concluded, the general deficiency appropriation bill may be reported when it is ready for the Senate. Under some late rule there is a question whether one can submit a report except when reports of committees are in order. The request is made simply to enable me to get in the bill later in the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have just come in. I would be glad to have the request restated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is that after reports of committees have been concluded the report of the general deficiency appropriation bill from the Committee on Appropriations may be received.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is aware that under some late rule it is difficult to report anything from a committee unless it is done under the call. The bill is not yet ready. I simply ask that after this order is concluded when the bill is ready the report may be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

OBSOLETE ORDNANCE AND ORDNANCE STORES.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19814) authorizing the issue of obsolete ordnance and ordnance stores for use of State and Territorial educational institutions and to State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes, to report it favorably without amendment; and I call the attention of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] to the same.

Mr. DICK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 6332) authorizing the issue of obsolete ordnance and ordnance stores for use of State and Territorial educational institutions and to State soldiers' and sailors' orphans' homes, and I move its indefinite postponement, as it relates to the same subject-matter that has been determined by the passage of the former bill.

The motion was agreed to.

WATERS OF LITTLE RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 20173) to authorize Henry T. Henderson and his associates to divert the waters of Little River from the lands of the United States for use of electric light and power plant, to report it favorably with amendments. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to this report.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Public Lands were, on page 1, line 5, before the word "lands," to strike out the words "the said," and after the word "lands," to strike out the word "so," so as to read:

That there be, and is hereby, granted unto Henry T. Henderson and associates the right or authority to perpetually divert the waters of Little River from lands owned by the United States of America, and situated in Mays Gulf, in township 8 south, range 9 east, in the State of Alabama, for the purpose of storing and utilizing said waters in the operation of a water-power plant to be erected at or near Blanche, in Cherokee County, in the State of Alabama, for the generation of electric energy or power, and the sale of electric light and electric power.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I observe the phrase occurs "after the passage of this bill." It seems to me it ought to read "this act." We never use the term "bill" in the body of an act.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Let that amendment be made.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, strike out the word "bill" and insert the word "act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. There was some confusion, and I did not catch the first phrase as to whether the bill is of general application——

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HEYBURN. Or special. It has no general application?

Mr. MORGAN. It is purely local and very unimportant to anybody except the parties there.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize Henry E. Henderson and his associates to divert the waters of Little River, in the State of Alabama, from the lands of the United States for use of electric light and power plant."

MARGARET BRANNON.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5545) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Brennon, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Pensions were, in line 6, to strike out "Brennon" and insert "Brannon;" and in the same line, after the word "Patrick," to strike out "Brennon" and insert "Brannon;" and in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Brannon, widow of Patrick Brannon, late of Company M, Sixty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Margaret Brannon."

EDWARD A. BARNES.

Mr. BURNHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 18601) granting an increase of pension to Edward A. Barnes, to report it favorably without amendment, and as this is an urgent case, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Edward A. Barnes, late of Company C, Sixth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Whereas on the 15th day of December, 1904, the Court of Claims made report to the President of the Senate pro tempore, in the case of James Davison, brevet captain, United States Army, retired, consisting of a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the aforesaid cause, which had been referred to said court by a resolution of the Senate of the United States under the act of March 3, 1887. The bill so referred by the said resolution of the Senate on the 27th day of June, 1904, was S. 1588, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, and related to the claim of James Davison, who was a brevet captain in the United States Army, retired, for longevity pay, in accordance with the act of June 18, 1878 (20 Statutes at Large, 150). An official copy of said report is embodied in Senate Document No. 58, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session, which is hereto attached and made a part hereof. In concluding its finding the court says:

"If said act is to be considered as retroactive, then the above balance shown would be the correct amount due; but if not, then there is nothing due."

Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the said report of the said Court of Claims be rereferred to the said court, with directions to amend its said report by stating whether or not the said act of June 18, 1878 (20 Statutes at Large, 150), ought to be considered as retroactive for the purposes of this case, and report at the next session of the Fifty-ninth Congress.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE introduced a bill (S. 6546) granting a pension to Mary McCarty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OVERMAN introduced a bill (S. 6547) for the relief of Thomas W. Mason and Benjamin R. Thomas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6548) for the relief of the legal representatives of George E. Kirk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6549) for the relief of the legal representatives of Stewart & Co. and A. P. H. Stewart, agent, for internal-revenue taxes collected between January 1, 1865, and January 1, 1866, and which have not been heretofore refunded, and for this purpose, any statutes of limitation to the contrary notwithstanding; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider its action in adopting the conference report on the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

I will state that, by unanimous consent, in the House the report has just been laid aside with the hope that a correction can be made in the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the Senate agreed to the conference report on House bill 19844, being the sundry civil appropriation bill, be reconsidered. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none. The conference report will be recommitted to the conferees.

Mr. HEMENWAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government, etc., with the amendments of the Senate thereto, and the message of the Senate of June 27, 1906, notifying the House of the agreement of the Senate to the conference report thereon.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report on the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes. The object is that the committee may make some formal adjustment of the language in the first and second paragraphs. It is for a formal matter purely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the conference report is withdrawn.

REPORT OF THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying reports, referred to the Committee on the Philippines:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the annual report of the Philippine Commission for the year 1905. The recommendations set forth in the accompanying letter of the Secretary of War have my cordial approval.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 28, 1906.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. I report back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, and I ask for its immediate consideration. I wish to state, on behalf of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that the members and the clerk of that committee have worked faithfully and laboriously through the night, and it has been impossible for the clerk to get up at this time a report to appear on the desk of Senators that would enlighten them in regard to the bill.

The total amount the bill carried as it came from the House is $21,065,000. The committee cut this amount $1,638,000, and the committee added to the bill $5,522,500, making a total increase of $4,084,500. Of this amount, $3,000,000 was added for the purchase of a site for the departmental building in this city for the use of the Department of State, the Department of Justice, and the Department of Commerce and Labor.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from West Virginia that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MALLORY. I endeavored to hear what the President was saying in reference to this bill. There was so much confusion I could not hear him. What was the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request was that the public-buildings bill be now considered and that the committee amendments be first acted upon. There being no objection, the Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in section 1, on page 2, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Colorado Springs, Colo., $75,000, of which amount the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to expend so much as may be necessary for the acquisition of additional land for the enlargement of the site heretofore acquired.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 14, to strike out:

United States post-office at Crawfordsville, Ind., $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at St. Paul, Minn., $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 4, to insert:

United States post-office at Reno, Nev., $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 22, to strike out:

United States custom-house at New York, N. Y., $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 16, to insert the following:

United States post-office at Ogden, Utah, $120,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 22, before the word

"thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Spokane, Wash., $75,000.

Mr. PILES. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment. Spokane is one of the——

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Washington will allow us to have the bill read through, we can pass over that amendment and come back to it.

Mr. PILES. Very well; I will make the same objection to the next amendment also where the appropriation is cut——

Mr. SCOTT. Very well; when we come to it, it can be passed over.

Mr. DICK. Are we to understand that it is to be the general rule to allow the bill to be read and then to go back to amendments?

Mr. SCOTT. If there is no objection to an item, we will not have to go back to it.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, on page 5, line 1, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Takoma, Wash., $75,000.

Mr. SCOTT. Let that amendment be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 13, to insert:

United States post-office at Evanston, Wyo., $5,000.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Secretary has already passed one item that I want to ask an increase of, and that is the allowance for the post-office building at Warren, Ohio. It is only $30,000. I have personal knowledge about that situation, and we might just as well have no appropriation as to have only $30,000.

Mr. SCOTT. That is not a committee amendment. That is an item in the bill as it came from the House. We are now considering the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendments under the unanimous-consent agreement are to be first considered.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that the Secretary is reading the bill, and after he has read the bill through we will go back and consider amendments. This I supposed was the reading of the bill. At any rate I want to give notice that as to one item I shall want to return to it at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to insert lines 14 and 15 on page 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, on page 5, line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office at Aurora Ill., $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office at Ottumwa, Iowa, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

United States post-office at Wichita, Kans., $50,000.

United States post-office at Brooklyn, N. Y., $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 24, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Columbus, Ohio, $300,000.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, this item for Columbus, Ohio——

Mr. SCOTT. Let the amendment be passed over, and we will come back to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. McLAURIN. Did not the Secretary overlook the item for Jackson, Miss., on line 11, page 6?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no amendment proposed to that item.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not hear what the Senator from Mississippi said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi merely inquired with respect to the item on page 6, line 11.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 2, to insert the following:

United States post-office at Salem, Oreg., $15,000.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let that amendment be passed over. I want to see the chairman of the committee on it before it is finally settled.

Mr. SCOTT. Very well.

United States post-office and court-house at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, $150,000.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to have this item passed over.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, if it is going to be the disposition of the Senate to object to every item that the committee has given consideration to all night, and that the House gave consideration to for, I suppose, two or three months, I presume our labors for the last twenty-four hours will go for naught. I am not saying this particularly to the Senator from Iowa, but it strikes me that Senators should not object to the amendments of the committee unless there is some very valid reason for the objection.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. I will say, if the Senator will allow me, that I am not referring particularly to him, and I agree to pass over this amendment to enable him to make his explanation when the proper time comes. But I do hope that Senators will not object to every little reduction and correction the committee has made. We have tried to be fair; we have tried to be just; we have tried to be economical.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, as I have already called attention to two or three items and will feel it my duty to call attention to two or three other items, it may be that the Senator from West Virginia had me in mind. However that may be——

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; I had not.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will not complain, because while we concede that he has conscientiously and very intelligently done his duty, we claim that we are doing the same. I had no opportunity to be heard before the committee. I went to the committee when the committee was in session. I got as far as the door, and I was told they would not hear anybody; and here is the only place we have a chance to be heard formally.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, the committee gave out information that as soon as the committee was organized and knew themselves what they wanted to do, or what they thought they wanted to do, we would be glad to hear any Senator for five or ten minutes. If the Senator did not get that word—of course I could not go and tell him——

Mr. FORAKER. I did not get that word. The announcement was not made in the Senate, and no word was sent to me. My understanding was that the committee would be in session yesterday morning, and when I went to the committee room for the purpose of being heard the chairman, after the committee had adjourned, did hear me, and I am much obliged to him. But that is neither here nor there. The only point I wanted to make is that while we do not like to raise objection to anything the chairman may have thought it was proper to put in the bill, it may be that we consider it to be our duty to do it. I am sure I do.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Ohio will kindly remember that this bill has to go to conference, and I take it for granted that he is familiar enough with the reports of committees carrying appropriations to know that possibly some of these things may be corrected in conference. If we had adopted the House bill as it came here, there would have been no need of a conference I take it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator speaks of this as a bill carrying appropriations. I do not know whether it does or not. So far as it has yet been read it simply provides the maximum amount——

Mr. SCOTT. Indirectly it carries appropriations.

Mr. FORAKER. Limiting the contracts that may be made. That is the reason why it is important as to some of these items that we shall have a word to say.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just a word. I think all Senators must understand that the situation is rather unusual. The bill came to us at a late hour yesterday from the House. The committee has been working almost all the hours in night and day since it received the bill. There seemed to be some inequalities in the bill as it came from the House, and while the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with the feeling which, I am willing to admit usually prevails in the Senate, would perhaps be more liberal, taking the bill as a whole, than the House in their judgment and duty have felt they could be, the comparison of one with the other was such that it seemed as if the Senate committee ought to attempt to regulate certain few of the House items.

I am frank to say that a number of those have been marked for change, so as to go into conference, where we can get the benefit of the information the House conferees undoubtedly have. Of course, as in the case of all well-conducted conferences, information finally brought out must prevail. If the Senate is wrong in these cuts, it must naturally expect to recede as well on an amount that they have cut down as on an amount that they have raised.

If I may have the attention of the Senator from Ohio especially, I trust the Senate will maintain its patience and kindness to this committee, and leave them with something in the bill to arbitrate and go into conference with, with the assurance that the information they will there have will, in my judgment, govern the action of the conference.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations with sundry amendments the bill (H. R. 20403) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes. I move that at 6 o'clock the Senate will take a recess until 8, in order that the bill may be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate shall take a recess at 6 o'clock until 8 o'clock this evening for the purpose——

Mr. HALE. No; I will not limit it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate take a recess at 6 o'clock until 8 o'clock this evening. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 8, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ninety" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and custom-house at Springfield, Mass., $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 17, to insert the following:

United States post-office at Kalamazoo, Mich., $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Duluth, Minn., $100,000.

Mr. CLAPP. I will ask that that amendment be passed over; and in this connection I desire to say I think we may just as well speak out in meeting here as not. Mr. President, I think the committee has done its very best with this bill, and, for one, I should be willing to sit here and accept the bill as they have presented it without any change; but what will interfere with the reading of the committee amendments is the thought on the part of Senators that where appropriations have been cut down in their States if they do not protect their loaclities other Senators will secure protection later for theirs, and the consequence will be that there will be endless interruption to the reading of the bill.

I would suggest, if it be in order, that the Senate committee amendments be read, with the understanding that after they are read any Senator may offer any individual amendment he desires. The action of the Senate on such an amendment would probably be a discouragement to the bringing up of any more amendments; at any rate, it would test the sense of the Senate as to whether or not the action of the committee should be torn to pieces, and it would secure the prompt and immediate reading of the committee amendments. If it is in order, I make that suggestion.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if the agreement suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] were reached, what would become of the amendments which have already been adopted? Unless everything is to go through and all of us stand on the same level, we do not want to sit here and see items which are of interest to us and our States adopted, when other items of similar import to other States have been passed, and then later, by some hocus-pocus—I do not charge that that would be by any indirection or possible collusion of the committee—but by some means or other the increases or the changes which Senators seek, or the changes to which they object, will be made.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the understanding might extend to this——

Mr. TILLMAN. Let the Senator from Minnesota request that we go back and start at the beginning, and let all of the amendments which have been agreed to go out. Let us all sit silent together, or let us all talk together.

Mr. CLAPP. My suggestion is, if it be the sense of the Senate, that the reading of this bill at this time, as to amendments which have been read and as to future amendments, shall be with the understanding that after the committee amendments have been read, then any Senator may raise the point as to any amendment he sees fit. I think, Mr. President, this would facilitate the passage of the bill, for the reason that probably the first effort of that kind would be promptly overthrown by the vote of the Senate; and that would discourage other Senators from attempting to interfere with the work of the committee; otherwise Senators will not sit silent and be estopped in the passage of these amendments as the reading of the bill proceeds under the present order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, it strikes me that up to the eighth page of the bill we have been getting along very well. The Senator from Minnesota noticed the reduction in the appropriation for Duluth, but if he will turn to Minneapolis he will see that the committee there increased the appropriation to $100,000 for his State. I think, looking at this bill as a whole, Senators will find that everybody has been at least justly dealt with, and I hope that the reading of the bill in the regular order may be proceeded with in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement which was made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLAPP. One moment, Mr. President. I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that my remarks were not intended as any reflection upon the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. I know that.

Mr. CLAPP. I said I would gladly sit here and vote for the adoption of this bill as reported by the committee, if we could be assured that that could be done, when we get through with the reading of the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota ask consent for the modification of the unanimous-consent agreement which was made?

Mr. CLAPP. No, Mr. President. It does not seem to be the sense of the Senate to adopt that suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, on page 8, line 21, to strike out "and twenty-five;" so as to make the appropriation for the United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Duluth, Minn., $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 8, after line 22, to insert the following:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty-five" and insert "sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that that amendment may be passed over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 11, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 22, to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 2, to insert:

United States post-office and other Government buildings at San Juan, P. R., $200,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment which has just been stated. The Senator from Ohio expressed an interest in that a moment ago, and I inquire if he desires to have the amendment passed over?

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to have the amendment passed over for the present, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 13, line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office at York, Nebr., $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "three hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

Mr. SCOTT. It goes in in another section.

Mr. CLAY. And consequently this $10,000——

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment in regard to Gadsden, Ala., to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] calls attention on page 25, provided simply for the purchase of a site. That has been stricken out, and in another and more appropriate part of the bill an appropriation of $60,000 is made for Gadsden for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building, so that this amendment of the Senate committee is proper, I think.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Alabama says that the item of $60,000 for Gadsden——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over in the absence of objection.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the reading of the bill been concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The formal reading of the bill has been concluded.

Mr. KEAN. Are amendments now in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are in order.

Mr. KEAN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

Mr. SCOTT. Would it not be the proper thing to take up the committee amendments which have been passed over before individual amendments are offered?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the first committee amendment passed over.

Mr. CULLOM. All I desired was to inquire of the chairman the course he wished to have pursued.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the committee amendments which have been passed over may be taken up.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator propose to have them acted upon now?

Mr. SCOTT. And acted upon.

Mr. CULLOM. All right.

Mr. KEAN. I have an amendment to come in at the end of the bill. I do not think it will take any time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. KEAN. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the first passed-over committee amendment be stated.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question for information. On page 7, beginning in line 3, there is an appropriation for Salem, Oreg., of $15,000. It reads:

United States post-office at Salem, Oreg., $15,000.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish the Senator would wait until we come to the amendment in its regular order.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to be informed whether or not that does not require amendment. The appropriation is for the purpose of improving the grounds and building approaches; and should not that be specified? I simply call the attention of the Senator to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the first amendment which has been passed over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the committee amendment in line 8, page 26, be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be passed over. The first committee amendment which has been passed over will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 22, page 4, strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Spokane, Wash., $75,000.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interpose any objection to the report of the committee, and I would not do so were it not for the fact that I have information in reference to the city of Spokane and also the city of Tacoma which the committee may not have had. I may as well say what I have to say about Spokane and Tacoma at the same time, and later on I shall briefly refer to Bellingham and North Yakima.

Mr. President, Spokane is a city of about 75,000 people, situated in the eastern part of the State of Washington. It is the center of a great mining and agricultural country. It is one of the most beautiful as well as one of the most progressive cities in the United States. I take it that no man who has ever visited that city failed to be impressed with its charm as well as with its business aspect and its undoubted future. While that city has to-day a population of some 75,000, those who are familiar with it will not hesitate to say that in the next seven or eight years it will have a population of 150,000.

Mr. President, the committee in the House, after thoroughly investigating this question and having before it the estimates of the Department recommending an addition of $300,000 for that city, concluded that it could not afford at the present time, notwithstanding that recommendation, to give more than $100,000, although the committee realized, I take it, that that sum was inadequate. The post-office receipts at Spokane within the last calendar year exceeded $200,000. It is the seat of the United States district court. There are located there the various officials connected with that court, United States inspectors, deputy collectors, and other Government officials, also the United States land offices. It is safe to say that the business of that community demands a large Government building, and that if the Government shall fail to appropriate the amount inserted in this bill a building totally inadequate to the wants of that community will be constructed.

The Senate itself a few years ago passed a bill carrying $700,000 for the construction of a building at that city, and while the House no doubt appreciated the necessity for a large building at Spokane, it evidently concluded that it was impossible for one at all suitable to be constructed there for less than $500,000. If this were a case where we could come back to a subsequent Congress and get an increase it would be an entirely different proposition; but what is done now is final and conclusive.

The same may be said with reference to the city of Tacoma. It is the headquarters of the internal-revenue collection district for the State of Washington and the Territory of Alaska. The United States court is held there, and it is the home of many public officials of the United States. It is one of the greatest commercial cities on the Pacific coast, and is destined to stand in the fore rank of any. It has a population now of something like 75,000, and will within a few years more than double that population. I think it would be unfair to that city, growing as rapidly as it is, to reduce the appropriation from $100,000 to $75,000.

The Department, I understand, has refrained from entering into contracts for the construction of the buildings at Tacoma and Spokane because it considered the sums heretofore appropriated insufficient for a public building in either city.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that Congress can afford to leave that section of the country without buildings sufficiently large to accommodate the demands of the Government business.

Therefore I hope the chairman of this committee, who is familiar with that section of the country, and who, I dare say, can substantiate what I have said with reference to the cities of which I have spoken, and I hope he will see that the amount appropriated by the House be retained in the bill.

I may say, in conclusion upon this proposition, that our delegation got together, and we came to the conclusion that we would not undertake to burden this bill with numerous appropriations for the various towns and cities in our State, but that we would confine ourselves for the present to carrying out the plan for constructing a Government building in the city of Tacoma and one in the city of Spokane sufficient to meet the needs of the people; also the purchase of sites at North Yakima and Bellingham.

When this bill came to the Senate, I conferred, as did my colleague, with our Congressmen in the House as to the advisability of proposing amendments for several other cities in the State. It was concluded on reflection that we would not vex the Senate or the committee with questions of that character; that while we felt that the House had not given us what we were justly entitled to receive, we concluded that we would nevertheless be content with the appropriation there made, feeling that the Senate would without question concur in the action of the House.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has certainly presented his case in the most favorable light. As the Senate will notice, the committee has cut the appropriation at Tacoma and Spokane only $25,000. In place of $100,000 the committee report $75,000.

In the report from the Treasury Department we find that at the Spokane office there have already been appropriated $100,000 for a site and $500,000 for a building. We find that $100,000 for the site and $500,000 for the building at Tacoma have been appropriated. Knowing that section of the country as I do, I think that the appropriation, with the addition of this $75,000, is a very liberal and ample one.

I further have to disagree with my good friend the Senator from Washington when he says that this is a mere trifling appropriation. There is a difference of only $25,000 at either place. The appropriation made by the House is $100,000, and we cut it to $75,000.

Now, Mr. President, I call your attention to one of the other points, North Yakima. The population of North Yakima is 3,154, and the postal receipts are only $21,000. They asked for an appropriation of $20,000 for a site in that village. Your committee thought that $10,000 would be ample to buy the very best site possible in the village, and, therefore, we cut that appropriation to $10,000.

In the other place, if you will notice in the Washington appropriation, there is no population given at all, and we did not know what the site would cost. The postal receipts there are $38,000, and we gave them $15,000 for a site.

Mr. President, I think we acted very generously with Washington; much more so than we have done with some other States, and I hope the Senate will stand by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee in line 22, page 4.

Mr. PILES. I do not understand that the question of North Yakima and Dillingham is before the Senate at present.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator will allow me, he referred to both places, and he said at the proper time he would take them up, and I thought what the Senator said warranted me in referring to them now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee in line 22, page 4. [Putting the question.] The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PILES. I misunderstood the motion. I understood that the question was on disagreeing to the amendment. I ask that the question be put again.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the President of the Senate kindly announce in voting on these amendments the vote sustaining the committee and the vote opposite, so that Senators may vote knowingly?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will allow me, when the Senator was talking and appealing very eloquently and strongly to us for his two magnificent cities I did not understand that he made any motion. I understood him, and I thought he was taking a very wise course, to only advise the committee, and through the committee its conferees, of the importance of the places he talked about—Spokane and Tacoma—and the necessity of enlarging the appropriation, but without asking the Senate to disagree with the committee amendment.

I wish to say just a word to my fellow-Senators and let them judge whether that word or suggestion is a good one or not. Where the House has appropriated an amount larger than the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have consented to, and where the Senate limit or cut is substituted, and Senators see that it must go to conference for final adjustment, had not all Senators better strengthen the hands of the conferees and strengthen the situation as between the House and the Senate by first stating their necessities and then allow the matter to pass on to the conferees?

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have served on every one of the conferences since the omnibus style of public-building bills was inaugurated. The President of this body served as chairman of that committee, and I know he will understand, as others who have served on it do, the many perplexities which surround the conduct of an omnibus bill where every Senator is looking, as he should, after his own particular State, and where the interests are sometimes adverse.

I do not know who will be the conferees upon this bill, but if you take these items up and each man insists on what he wants in each case and ask the whole Senate, as a body, to act separately on each item, there is no necessity of having a conference, and you deprive the conferees of having anything to confer about.

It is perfectly obvious, if we are going to have a conference at all, that the best course for this body to pursue would be to leave the conferees with some strength. So I would suggest, and I can only make the suggestion, of course, that those Senators who feel aggrieved at the action of the committee in cutting down items make their statements and their arguments here, and then relegate the matter to the conference so far as it concerns the Senate cuts made in House amounts.

Of course, if a new amount has been put in by the Senate that is too low and should be raised, or if there is a new item needed, that is on an entirely different basis. But I do believe we will have a much better bill if each Senator leaves the conferees with something in their hands to confer about or agree to with the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question.

Mr. PILES. Before it is stated I wish to make one remark to the chairman of the committee. His statement is that $500,000 has been appropriated for a building at Spokane and a similar amount for one at Tacoma. I have a statement here from the Congressman from that district showing that a site has already been purchased at Tacoma and Spokane; that there has been appropriated for the building in each place $400,000; that the Treasury Department recommended $300,000 additional for a building in each city.

I do not know just what is the proper procedure in cases of this character. I wish to do whatever is good practice in such matters, and I hope Senators will not reduce the appropriation made by the House.

Mr. CARTER. The suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] would lead us to pursue a course entirely at variance with the parliamentary usage of this body. It must not be forgotten that an agreement to an amendment unsatisfactory to a majority of the Senate is a misrepresentation of the views of the majority. The mere fact that the committee has made a report does not put the Senate in a position to become merely advisory to that committee.

I understand very clearly the position of the committee. I think it is understood that this bill having been materially increased in some particulars, it has been decreased in other respects, so as to make a nice balance of it all and give the committee something upon which to trade in conference. That is the plain English of the proposition.

Mr. President, the Senate must express its actual views and not the views of the committee upon particular items in the bill. It does seem to me a useless waste of time to place observations in the RECORD which will not be read by the conferees, and to pass over the Senate's inherent right to cast a vote upon the merits of the pending proposition.

The committee, it is true, performed their service under great difficulties and great pressure. They are entitled to the thanks of the Senate for the industrious and assiduous manner in which they have addressed themselves to the task. Their completed work comes here for the Senate's approval or disapproval. In the main the Senate has indicated approval of the work, but certain reservations have been made as the reading of the bill has progressed.

Now, it is suggested that we merely express our views concerning these reservations, but refrain from recording our judgment in the RECORD. I, for one, if voting alone, will vote upon the merits of the proposition upon my convictions with reference to it. I do not understand that, by virtue of insisting upon a plain parliamentary right, any reflection whatever is cast upon the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CARTER. I am glad to hear the Senator.

HOURS OF LABOR OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5133) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. I ask that the unfinished business may go over until we are through with the discussion of the public buildings bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not consent to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I move that the unfinished business be laid aside until the completion of the public buildings bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that perhaps the unfinished business can be disposed of by a vote. It has been debated here for several days, and unless some Senator wants to talk on it the matter can be ended and no further time consumed in its consideration.

Mr. SCOTT. My motion is that the unfinished business be laid aside and the Senate proceed with the consideration of the public buildings bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Until what time?

Mr. SCOTT. Until the public buildings bill is concluded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the Senator from Wisconsin will consent to laying aside the unfinished business without prejudice, it will then remain, I understand, as the unfinished business. If a motion is made and carried to take up the public buildings bill and proceed with it, does it not displace the other bill as the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it does.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he would effect what he wants very much quicker and in a better way to consent to set the unfinished business aside under an arrangement than to have it displaced by a motion, if the motion should carry.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. Answering the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina, I notice in the RECORD this morning that the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday offered six amendments to his bill. I intended as soon as I reached the Senate this morning to ascertain what those amendments were, but I have not had a minute in which to do it, because of the public-buildings bill being under consideration. The Senator offered six amendments yesterday. I remember that I offered six the day before, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] offered one or more amendments. I do not know how many amendments there are. I wish we could have a reprint of the bill and amendments. There is at least one other amendment that I want to offer.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall insist upon the consideration of the public-buildings bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, that it be taken up after the public-buildings bill is disposed of, and that a vote be taken to-morrow at 4 o'clock upon the pending amendments and the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside until after the completion of the consideration of the public-buildings bill, and that a vote be taken upon the unfinished business and pending amendments thereto at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. The unfinished business is the bill in charge of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the bill in charge of the Senator from Wisconsin. Is there objection?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should not object if the Senator would amend his unanimous consent so as to except the consideration of conference reports.

Mr. KEAN. And appropriation bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent agreement not to affect the presentation and consideration of conference reports.

Mr. WARREN. And appropriation bills.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I object to the request for unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. WARREN. Will not the Senator divide the question? He submitted two propositions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would rather submit another request. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, because I well understand that the bill being a measure only in the interest of public safety it would be displaced by the public-buildings bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection?

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that while we are finishing the appropriation bill there might be a reprint, if he would ask for it, of his bill, showing all the amendments. That would help us very materially.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reprint of the bill, showing the amendments?

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggested certain amendments yesterday which will be found in the RECORD. I will ask that those amendments be printed as having been proposed by me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In view of the night session, I suggest that the printing be done at once, so that the bill with the amendments will be on the desks of Senators immediately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question for unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I shall take no exception to the remarks made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. I was only suggesting a way out of confusion and delay, as I thought, because while it is true that only a part of these differences were passed, for the Senate to turn back and pick up again, yet other items not excepted to were equally meritorious, and Senators who did not object as the bill was read will expect to have the same opportunity with their amendments as those who made the exceptions when we went along.

Now, I suggest to the Senator from Montana and other Senators that if you bring any one of these matters up for a vote and test of strength, it would be rather unfair to leave out Senators who said nothing at the time, but were willing to leave the matters to the conference. That is all I have to suggest.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
F. M. SIMMONS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
CHAS. F. SCOTT,
JOHN LAMB,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I think I can in a very few minutes explain the points that Senators will be glad to know about in the report.

Taking up the items in order from which the Senate conferees receded, Nos. 7, 8, 10, 36, and 38 were merely slight increases that we made in mechanics, and we found that the House had also increased them. We did not think two increases on the same bill advisable.

We receded from Nos. 17 and 18, "For the purchase of scientific and other publications" for the Weather Bureau, because we thonght those should be purchased by the Library.

We receded from No. 54, an increase of $5,000 for experiments in the cultivation of matting grass, because it was not in the proper place, and we added it to No. 47, for the general expenses of the Bureau of Plant Industry. The $25,000 asked for by the fruit interests of California was also added to that appropriation, making a total of $495,000, the whole amount that the Senate asked for.

The Senate conferees receded from No. 74, the amendment offered by the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in regard to undrawn poultry.

We also recede from No. 78, the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] in regard to experiments in the cultivation of plants in the irrigated districts, because we deemed that it was covered by other provisions.

Th Senate recedes from No. 90, the addition of one clerk in the Bureau of Biological Survey, and also from the addition of $5,000 to the general appropriation for that Bureau.

The Senate recedes from No. 96, an increase of $200 in the salary of the cashier in the Division of Accounts.

It also recedes from No. 137, an increase of $500 in the salary of the Director of the Office of Public Roads, because that officer had only been there a short time. He is a very competent man, but we thought that perhaps it is too early to make an increase.

The items to which the House agrees with an amendment are as follows:

No. 47 I have already stated.

No. 52 the House agrees to with an amendment striking out, after the word "grades," the rest of the paragraph, and inserting as follows: "and for the issuance of certificates of inspection when requested by the consignor or consignee of any grain entering into interstate or foreign commerce."

The House also agrees to amendment No. 68, with an amendment adding a proviso which had been in previous laws and was inadvertently omitted.

The Senate recedes from its amendment No. 69, and agrees to it with an amendment as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in collaboration with the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and such other experts as he may deem necessary, to ascertain the purity of food products and determine what are regarded as adulterations therein.

This is a provision which has been in previous laws for a number of years.

Amendment No. 84 is a compromise between "one clerk," as the House had it, and "three clerks," as the Senate amended it, making it "two clerks."

No. 87 (Bureau of Entomology), the House made the general appropriation $68,000 and the Senate $80,000. It was compromised to $75,000.

In No. 126 the Senate yielded $8,620 in the appropriation for experiment stations. In the item for public roads the House gave $60,000, the Senate $80,000, and the conference report makes it $70,000.

As to amendment No. 152, "For the extension of forest planting," the planting part was omitted, but the provision for building a permanent station on the Dismal River Forest Reserve, Nebr., $2,500, was retained, and the balance was yielded by the Senate, as it is sufficiently provided for under the general forestry appropriation.

In regard to amendment No. 150, the committee of conference was confronted by a peculiar situation and departed from the ordinary and proper province of a conference committee. That was the appropriation of $65,000 in regard to the gipsy and brown-tail moths, which was increased by the Senate to $100,000. The conferees on the part of the House claimed that there was an understanding in their committee, or in the House, that it should stand the same as the appropriation in the clause following on page 90, for eradicating the ticks transmitting southern cattle fever. Your conferees claimed that they were not parties to any such understanding, that they had never heard of it, and could not consider it; that the appropriation must stand on its own merits, and that it was very important that the whole amount should be given. Though the Senate were not in any wise a party to that understanding, we thought it would avoid friction and promote harmony if they were continued the same. The conference committee, therefore, recommends that the increase of $35,000 made by the Senate to the gipsy-moth item be divided; that it stand at $82,500; and that one-half be added to the appropriation for eradicating the cattle tick, leaving both appropriations at $82,500. We submit this, stating its irregularity, but recommending that the action of the conferees be approved by the Senate. It is not a very important matter.

I should like to say that the conferees have agreed to the amendment of the Senate in regard to the examination of food products, and I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to this. The pure-food bill has been recently before the House of Representative, and the House conferees insisted that there was nothing in the provision that was in conflict with the pure-food bill. I also called up the Secretary of Agriculture and the solicitor of that Department. The Secretary said that some days ago he had submitted this matter to the solicitor, who said there would be no conflict, and no harm could arise from retaining the provision of the Senate, and the House conferees therefore receded.

This leaves, Mr. President, nothing disagreed to except amendment No. 29, in regard to cattle inspection, and four amendments that are contingent upon that.

I move that the report of the committee of conference be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I now move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a further conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. SIMMONS were appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

S. 369. An act to authorize the appointment of Acting Asst. Surg. Reuben A. Campbell, United States Navy, as an assistant surgeon in the United States Navy;

S. 1211. An act to correct the military record of John Alspaugh;

S. 4197. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to enter on the roll of Capt. Orlando Humason's Company B, First Oregon Mounted Volunteers, the name of Hezekiah Davis;

S. 6004. An act to provide an American register for the steam yacht Waturus;

S. 6463. An act waiving the age limit for admission to the Pay Corps of the United States Navy in the case of Frank Holway Atkinson; and

S. 6365. An act granting a pension to Edward S. Bragg.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1725) granting certain lands to the Missionary Baptist Church, of Rock Sink, Fla., with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House relative to the appointment of a joint special committee to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the revision and codification of laws prepared by the Statutory Revision Commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States.

CODE PREPARED BY THE STATUTORY REVISION COMMISSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] as the members of the joint committee on the part of the Senate under the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the revision and codification of laws prepared by the Statutory Revision Commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States.

CHANNELS ON NEW JERSEY COAST.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that there may be laid before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina first rose, and the Chair asked the Senator from West Virginia if he would yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood I had the floor in my own right.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the Senator desire to address the Senate for some length of time?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; I desire to address the Senate.

Mr. KEAN. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that I wish merely to secure concurrence in a resolution from the House of Representatives requesting that there be sent to the House a copy of a Senate bill which has been lost or mislaid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and then the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. KEAN. Will the Chair kindly lay before the Senate the resolution from the House of Representatives to which I have referred?

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives; which, on motion of Mr. KEAN, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 6167) authorizing the State of New Jersey to improve the channels along the New Jersey coast, under State authority, the original having been lost or mislaid.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I was not aware of the fact that the Senator from South Carolina desired to make a speech. I thought he wanted to submit a report from a conference committee, or I should have asked him to allow the pending public buildings bill to be proceeded with until we have disposed of the amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I may just as well speak to one of these amendments as to any other thing around here, feeling that there will be enough to consume the balance of to-day and possibly to-morrow. I have been waiting for several days. I was too ill to speak yesterday or the day before, and I want to speak now.

Mr. SCOTT. I will yield to the Senator from South Carolina if he will yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to make a conference report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly; I will do that with pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 88) entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment.

Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture within any Territory or the District of Columbia any article of food or drug which is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each offense shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed five hundred dollars or shall be sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and for each subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one thousand dollars or sentenced to one year's imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

"SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, within the meaning of this act, is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or foreign country, and having so received, shall deliver, in original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such article so adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or any person who shall sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States any such adulterated or misbranded foods or drugs, or export or offer to export the same to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding two hundred dollars for the first offense, and upon conviction for each subsequent offense not exceeding three hundred dollars or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no article shall be deemed misbranded or adulterated within the provisions of this act when intended for export to any foreign country and prepared or packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is intended to be shipped; but if said article shall be in fact sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption, then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of any of the other provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act, including the collection and examination of specimens of foods and drugs manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or which shall be offered for sale in unbroken packages in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or which shall be received from any foreign country, or intended for shipment to any foreign country, or which may be submitted for examination by the chief health, food, or drug officer of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or at any domestic or foreign port through which such product is offered for interstate commerce, or for export or import between the United States and any foreign port or country.

"SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods and drugs shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such articles are adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and if it shall appear from any such examination that any of such specimens is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the party from whom such sample was obtained. Any party so notified shall be given an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if it appears that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such party, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer. After judgment of the court, notice shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations aforesaid.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any health or food or drug officer or agent of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States, without delay, for the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

"SEC. 6. That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary for internal or external use, and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease of either man or other animals. The term "food," as used herein, shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound.

"SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

"In case of drugs:

"First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of investigation: Provided, That no drug defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof although the standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary.

"Second. If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold.

"In the case of confectionery:

"If it contains terra alba barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substance or poisonous color or flavor, or other ingredient deleterious or detrimental to health, or any vinous, malt, or spirituous liquor or compound or narcotic drug.

The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

"SEC. 11. The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request from time to time, samples of foods and drugs which are being imported into the United States or offered for import, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture, and have the right to introduce testimony, and if it appear from the examination of such samples that any article of food or drug offered to be imported into the United States is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or is otherwise dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or is of a kind forbidden entry into, or forbidden to be sold or restricted in sale in the country in which it is made or from which it is exported, or is otherwise falsely labeled in any respect, the said article shall be refused admission, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any goods refused delivery which shall not be exported by the consignee within three months from the date of notice of such refusal under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee such goods pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a penal bond for the amount of the full invoice value of such goods, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such goods for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, when demanded, for the purpose of excluding them from the country, or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond: And provided further, That all charges for storage, cartage, and labor on goods which are refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee, and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importation made by such owner or consignee.

"SEC. 12. That the term 'Territory' as used in this act shall include the insular possessions of the United States. W. P. HEPBURN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would say that the conference report was withdrawn this morning merely for the purpose of transposing and correcting certain language in it that was found to be duplicated in two sections. It is now in correct form. I ask that the Senate agree to the report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I did not understand the motion or request of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was that the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. BAILEY. And that passes the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that bill has not been printed yet, I understand, as it has been agreed upon by the conference committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been printed, I will say to the Senator, with the exception that it was found upon examination this morning that a certain provision had been duplicated in section 2, which was in section 1. We merely cut it out of the section where it was duplicated. The bill is already printed.

Mr. BAILEY. I tried to get a copy of that bill yesterday.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been printed and placed on the desks of Senators this morning.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator to let the conference report lie over.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it lie over for the present?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes. I would like to have an opportunity to look at it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well. I will call it up later.

IMMUNITY OF WITNESSES.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following report:

UNITED STATES COURTS IN CHINA.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17345) creating a United States district court for China and prescribing the jurisdiction thereof, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: Insert at the end of section 2 as follows:

"The said United States court for China shall have and exercise supervisory control over the discharge by consuls and vice-consuls of the duties prescribed by the laws of the United States relating to the estates of decedents in China. Withing sixty days after the death in China of any citizen of the United States, or any citizen of any territory belonging to the United States, the consul or vice-consul whose duty it becomes to take possession of the effects of such deceased person under the laws of the United States shall file with the clerk of said court a sworn inventory of such effects, and shall, as additional effects come from time to time into his possession, immediately file a supplemental inventory or inventories of the same. He shall also file with the clerk of said court within said sixty days a schedule, under oath, of the debts of said decedent, so far as known, and a schedule or statement of all additional debts thereafter discovered. Such consul or vice-consul shall pay no claims against the estate without the written approval of the judge of said court, nor shall he make sale of any of the assets of said estate without first reporting the same to said judge and obtaining a written approval of said sale, and he shall likewise, within ten days after any such sale, report the fact of such sale to said court and the amount derived therefrom. The said judge shall have power to require at any time reports from consuls or vice-consuls in respect of all their acts and doings relating to the estate of any such deceased person. The said court shall have power to require, where it may be necessary, a special bond for the faithful performance of his duty, to be given by any consul or vice-consul into whose possession the estate of any such deceased citizen shall have come, in such amount and with such sureties as may be deemed necessary; and for failure to give such bond when required, or for failure to properly perform his duties in the premises, the court may appoint some other person to take charge of said estate, such person having first given bond as aforesaid. A record shall be kept by the clerk of said court of all proceedings in respect of any such estate under the provisions hereof."

And the Senate agree to the same.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, at the request of the Senate, the House of Representatives has returned the conference report on the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes. I ask that the report may be temporarily withdrawn from the Senate and recommitted to the committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20410) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for one moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to call the attention of the Senate, and especially the attention of the Senator from South Carolina—for he has been engaged on conference committees for the last two weeks—to the fact that this public buildings bill, after we are through with it here, will have to be reprinted and go to conference, as a matter of course. I understand we are trying to wind up this session by Saturday next. If that is the case, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if this bill fails, it will not be my fault.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I feel like apologizing to the Senate for going counter to the current of feeling and desire here. I have never obstructed public business that I am aware of, certainly not intentionally, and I do not intend to obstruct it this evening. I am sorry to have to speak on the subject which I will disucss at this time and in this way, but it is very evident, under the pressure which is in this Chamber and in the Capitol, hurrying and rushing, trying to get through with the matters that have been mapped out by the leaders or bosses, that if I do not break in and speak anyway, the opportunity, in an orderly manner and under the regular course of procedure, will never come.

I do not intend to discuss this bill at all in any of its features or phases. I have had nothing to do with it in any shape, form, or fashion, and I have not been near the committee to ask any favors in regard to public buildings. My State is fairly well treated through the work of my colleagues in the other end of the Capitol and of my colleague at this end. I have had other things to do. But it is probably as appropriate for me to discuss the question which I shall discuss on the public-building bill as it would be in any other way or at any other time, because the occurrence which is the cause of my speaking took place in a public building and in the public grounds of the United States.

My efforts to have the facts brought out with regard to that occurrence have been pushed aside or turned down by the majority in this Chamber. While I have no complaint to make, I still feel the obligation of duty to present some of the facts that are now allowed to come to light that the public has never yet had an opportunity to know.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FLINT. I want to ask the Senator if he would yield to me for a moment for the consideration of a House bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. If I yield to one Senator I will have to yield to twenty Senators. There are Senators all around me desiring to do something. We are all under whip and spur. I am under whip and spur myself, because I want to get away from here. I think if I stay in this city forty-eight hours longer I will be sick abed. I want to go home, and I will quit whether this Congress quits or not.

It will be recalled, Mr. President, that on the 17th of January last I made a speech in this Chamber in which I discussed the transactions under the orders of the President in Santo Domingo, and in criticising the acts of the President, among other things, I brought up as a matter that appeared to me of very serious moment, the expulsion from the Executive Offices of an elderly lady, a woman turned 50, under such brutal and cruel circumstances and with, as I thought, such uncalled-for exercise of authority that I went very far, perhaps, in criticising the present incumbent of the White House.

In that speech matters were brought up by a Senator that need not have been injected. I was charged with gratifying my personal hatred and with dealing with a delicate question in an undignified way. Taunted with speaking from hearsay and not being able to prove what I asserted, I asked for a committee of inquiry. The next morning, when the resolution which I offered came up, the Senate, as was its right, and probably as it was its duty under the circumstances, voted down and laid on the table the resolution of inquiry. I did not feel aggrieved. I realized that there was a difference of opinion, perhaps, against my view of it as to the propriety of the Senate taking cognizance of and investigating by a committee acts done in the White House, or in one of the offices of the White House, though the most brutal part had taken place out of doors in the public ground; but the Senate refused to order an investigation.

Things went on. I had wiped my hands of the occurrence. I had been criticised severely and held up to scorn by certain men and certain newspapers for having presumed to express my honest feeling in regard to what had occurred, but I went on my way, as I have always done since I came here, without parade or bravado or endeavoring to advertise myself, if I may use the phrase; and I never would have broached the subject again or taken any action concerning it but for the fact that in April—I think it was about the 1st of April, the name of the man who must be held responsible until the facts are brought out and some one else shown to be responsible, if that ever occurs—the name of this man was sent to the Senate to fill one of the most important and lucrative offices in the gift of the Executive. His nomination to the position of postmaster of Washington was thrown in the teeth, at least of myself, certainly of the Senate, though the Senate has not shown its teeth in connection with it. Then the question arose as to whether this man was qualified or fitted by training and character to hold this high office. When this nomination was sent in I went to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and requested that a subcommittee of that committee be appointed to consider and report on the nomination. Having been asked to state in writing what my objections were, I prepared and sent to the chairman of the subcommittee a letter, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

No. 1.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1906.

Hon. THOMAS H. CARTER,
Chairman of Subcommittee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, United States Senate.

SIR: I hereby notify you that I desire to protest against the confirmation of Benjamin F. Barnes as postmaster for the city of Washington, and ask permission to appear before the committee with witnesses, whose names are hereto annexed, to prove the following charges, showing Mr. Barnes's unfitness for the office:

1. That Mr. Barnes is lacking in gentlemanly and manly consideration for ladies, which caused him to abuse his authority so far as to order the expulsion from the Executive Offices of Mrs. Minor Morris on January 4, 1906, without any justification or good reason therefor.

2. That having issued the order he stood by and saw it executed in a most brutal and outrageous manner without interference, compelling the policemen to drag and finally, with the aid of a negro employed at the White House, to carry her, with the negro holding her by the ankles and with her limbs exposed, the entire distance from the Executive Offices, at the western end of the White House, to the eastern exit, where she was thrust into a cab and sent to the house of detention, by which brutal treatment her life was endangered and health seriously impaired from shock and injuries received.

3. That after this tyrannical and outrageous abuse of his authority he lodged charges of insanity against Mrs. Morris and compelled her to remain in prison for more than four hours, thus adding insult to injury and producing in the public mind impressions derogatory to both her reputation and her mental condition.

4. That he made a statement to the press which was full of falsehoods and which proves him to be lacking in that integrity and high character which a high Government official should have.

The following are the witnesses I would like to have examined:

(1) Mr. Walter E. Clark, 1417 G street, Washington, D. C.
(2) Mr. Robert H. Hazard, 501 Fourteenth street, Washington, D. C.
(3) Mr. I. C. Norwood, the Star office, Washington, D. C.
(4) Mr. James H. Price, the Times office, Washington, D. C.
(5) Mr. Henry C. Biggs, New York World office, Washington, D. C.
(6) Mr. Elmer E. Payne, Associated Press, Washington, D. C.
(7) Mr. Jules Guthridge, 1713 Riggs place, Washington, D. C.

Very respectfully, yours,

B. R. TILLMAN.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I presented the statement of facts I felt able to prove; the subcommittee met, considered the charges which I had presented, and talked over the situation. They were informed that it was my desire to have the matter over with as soon as possible, and in the secrecy of the executive session, and that I had no purpose or desire to reopen in public or to bring to the attention of the country this unfortunate transaction; that I wanted the facts brought out and let the Senate, having possession of the facts, determine once for all whether to confirm this man; that a vote might be had at any time, and I would not obstruct. The subcommittee agreed—at least I understood them to agree—that they would grant the investigation, but that in order to go about it in the lawful way and have power to send for persons and papers it would be necessary to have a resolution passed by the Senate giving such authority.

The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], was away. It was two or three days before he returned, and when he returned from Pennsylvania I was informed that an investigation would not be had; that the resolution empowering the committee to send for persons and papers would not be offered, and that there would be no chance for me to prove the facts which I have asserted in the Senate, first in January, as to what took place, and, secondly, the charges that I had made to the committee in writing, which have just been read.

When the matter was brought up in executive session, which was shortly afterward, arguments were made pro and con, reasons were given for and against an investigation, and the matter was never determined finally until a few days ago, when the Senate, by a vote of all the Republican Senators but two, voted against having an investigation.

Having been informed that the defense of Mr. Barnes would be along the line of contention that his ordering Mrs. Morris arrested and expelled from the Executive Office might have been an error of judgment, might have been excusable somewhat, and that therefore the investigation, if one were had, should be of the action of the police outside of the Executive Office, I had prepared and offered in the open Senate, on May 1, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. TILLMAN. Most Senators have read it. I do not object to having it go into the RECORD without being read, because I do not care to consume any more time than I am compelled to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed in the RECORD without being read.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to investigate the circumstances of the arrest in the city of Washington, January 4, 1906, by the Metropolitan police, of Mrs. Minor Morris, and her carriage, attended by indignity and cruelty, through the grounds and basement of one of the public buildings and thence, after being thrown violently into a cab, to the House of Detention, and her incarceration for four hours on a charge of disorderly conduct, and later of insanity.

And also to investigate the manner and result of an inquiry made by Maj. Richard Sylvester, superintendent of Metropolitan police, into the facts of the case; and to inquire whether said investigation was fair and unprejudiced and all the impartial and available witnesses examined.

Whether said superintendent undertook to make an investigation by the use of detectives and secret-service men concerning the previous life and reputation of Mrs. Morris.

Whether he procured and made use of a statement of one H. B. Weaver, doctor of medicine, who falsely pretended that Mrs. Morris had been a patient of his in Asheville, N. C., two years ago.

Whether there is any police regulation in the city of Washington which requires that any person arrested shall not be released until taken to police headquarters and there detained until a police inquiry is instituted and ended.

And especially to inquire whether the said superintendent of police, and one of the chief witnesses against Mrs. Morris, have since received recognition by the appointment of near relatives to office; and whether any laws should be adopted by Congress for the better regulation and improvement of the police force of the city of Washington.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it had passed the Senate and an investigation had been ordered, it would have been a searching one and would have gone into the various matters which I shall discuss as I go along.

It seems to me nothing but just and right that the defense or explanation of Mr. Barnes should now be read, in order that those who have never seen it, because it has only recently been released from the secrecy of executive session, may hear for themselves his explanation and defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

No. 3.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 20, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR CARTER: Replying to your note of the 20th instant in connection with the proposed inquiry by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads into the matter of my nomination to be postmaster of Washington:

(1) I was born at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, December 3, 1868. My father was born in the State of New York, my mother in the State of Maine. Their ancestors, back to a time preceding the Revolution, were natives of either New York or Massachusetts. My father was temporarily engaged in business in Nova Scotia at the time of my birth, and my parents remained there until I was about 7 years old, when they returned to the United States, going to New Jersey, where my father lived until the time of his death, in 1891. My parents never at any time relinquished their American citizenship nor took the slightest step in that direction.

(2) My present legal residence is in the State of New Jersey, and that has been my legal residence ever since I was old enough to vote. I desire to add that I have had no other ties in New Jersey since 1892, when the surviving members of my family removed to Washington, where they now reside.

(3) Mrs. Minor Morris called at the Executive Office on January 4, 1906, at about 1 o'clock and asked to be allowed to see the President. At the time, Secretary Loeb was engaged with the President, and I saw her. Upon inquiry as to the nature of her business she stated with considerable reluctance that her husband had been unjustly dismissed from a branch of the War Department; that she did not propose to have anything to do with the Secretary of War concerning it, but that she wanted the President to take it up and see that justice was done. She was informed that the President could not give personal attention to such a matter and that the decision of the Secretary of War would be final. She insisted that she must see the President, and when told that that was out of the question she asserted in boisterous manner that she would not be prevented from seeing him and that she would remain where she was for a month, if need be, unless she saw him sooner. She was allowed to remain for some moments. When I returned to the reception room shortly after, I found her pacing excitedly up and down the room, and informed her as quietly as possible that she could not see the President and that it would be useless for her to remain longer. She replied in a loud voice that she would see him and that she would stay there until she did. She was then advised to drop the matter and to go away quietly. This, in still louder tones, she refused to do.

She was then told that she must either leave the office at once voluntarily or it would be necessary to have her put out of the building. At this she shrieked at the top of her voice, "I will not be put out," rushed to a chair, threw herself into it, and shouted, "Don't you have any hands laid on me; I am going to stay here until I see the President." Mrs. Morris's piercing shrieks were heard throughout the building, and it became necessary in the interest of order to have her removed. She was accordingly taken in charge by a police officer who had witnessed the whole affair. He asked her to go with him quietly. She refused, and told him that if she was removed she would have to be dragged every step of the way. Before applying force the officer asked her three times to leave the office quietly. She shrieked her refusal to each request, and was then led from the room. She struggled violently with two officers (all the way from the office building to the eastern entrance of the White House). As soon as she was outside of the office building she threw herself on the ground, and it became necessary to carry her.

The above facts, with the exception of the part in parentheses, came under my personal observation. They were made public by the Executive Office in my name on the next morning, together with the following statements, based on the first reports of the police officers who took part in the affair:

"The officers repeatedly asked her to stand up and walk quietly with them so that they would not have to use force, but she refused to do so and defied them in shrieks that were heard throughout the White House. She was finally removed to police headquarters, where she was charged with disorderly conduct. After her arrest she produced an envelope addressed to the President, which she asked to have delivered to him. This envelope was found to contain a lengthy poem on the subject of insomnia, which she said was her own composition. She stated to the officers that she had not slept for seven nights past. There is no truth whatever in the statement made by many of the papers that a negro laid hold of Mrs. Morris and assisted in carrying her. One of the colored messengers of the office followed the policemen and gathered up such small articles as were dropped in the woman's struggles; but there was no other foundation whatever for the statement."

It will be noticed that the last two sentences are somewhat at variance with statements made later by Officers Frech and Murphy to Major Sylvester and recently submitted to your committee through Senator BURROWS. These officers explained to me afterwards that their attention had been so fully occupied by Mrs. Morris herself at the time that they had had little if any opportunity for accurate observation of any other features of the matter.

(4) In causing Mrs. Morris's removal from the Executive Office I acted under general instructions. I know you will appreciate the difficulty of stating specifically the substance of the instructions and by whom issued when I say that the reception and disposition of callers has been a part of my duties for four or five years, and that during that time cases of eccentricity, dementia, and insanity of various degrees had been encountered by me almost every day among the callers at the Executive Office. My general instructions were necessarily made up from innumerable experiences and countless directions given from time to time by the two Secretaries to the President under whom I have served in such capacity.

Very truly, yours,

B. F. BARNES.

Hon. THOMAS H. CARTER,
Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will comment later on some of the language which Mr. Barnes uses. At the present time I want to put in the RECORD, because I desire to be entirely fair and not garble this testimony or use special pleading in dealing with it—and I doubt whether anybody else will ever take the trouble to present it to the Senate or to discuss it—the voluntary statement of Elmer E. Paine, made to the President, without dating it, shortly after the occurrence, I suppose, in the form of "a memorandum." I will state that Mr. Paine is one of the witnesses whom I asked to have summoned. He was one of the six newspaper men who were in and around the Executive Offices when the Morris incident took place, and one of the remarkable things about it is that he is the only one who ever had anything to say about it outside of his own newspaper or in private conversation, because while an investigation, or a pretense of an investigation, was ordered by the superintendent and chief of police at the command of the President, this newspaper man, one among six, was the only one who was permitted to give any statement or was asked to give any statement.

Before sending Mr. Paine's memorandum up, I wish to call attention to some things that are in it. I will not have it read, but will ask to have it printed. I presume some of the newspapers will probably print this whole record. The Evening Star, of this city, for instance, has been very earnest and zealous in trying to see justice done in this case, and therefore the citizens of Washington will probably have the opportunity to read in that paper everything in the shape of new testimnoy, at least that I shall present. But in order not to consume too much time—and there is so much of this material that it will take a long time—I wish to call attention to some things in Mr. Paine's statement. Speaking of Mrs. Morris and her action before she was arrested or just after she was arrested, he said:

Finally, however, she dropped to the pavement, in a sitting posture.

Then he goes on to say:

Seemingly, they—

did their best to protect her clothing from the mud and water, but, in the circumstances, that was not entirely possible.

Further on he volunteers the opinion, which was an act of temerity on his part, I presume:

My opinion is that she ought to have been released when the officers got her outside of the entrance to the offices, but I understand that the police regulations provide for the action of officers in such cases, and had they released her they would have laid themselves liable to a suit for assault, once having placed their hands upon her.

At the close he says:

Mr. Barnes did all that he could have been expected to do to avert a scene. He treated Mrs. Morris in a quiet and dignified manner, time and again urging her not to make any trouble. He might have permitted her to retain her seat in the Executive Office reception room, but, in my judgment, his action in that regard was purely a matter of opinion. He thought Mrs. Morris was insane, as I have learned since, and her action and manner, it is only just to say, probably warranted such an assumption on his part.

After reading those little extracts, I simply ask that the letter be inserted in its proper place in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

[Memorandum for the President.]

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

Re the incident of Mrs. Minor Morris.

About 1 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, January 4, 1906, a distressing scene was enacted in and near the Executive Offices of the White House. A woman of mature years—a lady in appearance—was ejected forcibly from the offices and subsequently was taken to the house of detention. Investigation afterwards disclosed certain facts concerning her.

She was Mrs. Minor Morris, a woman 50 years of age, and the wife of Dr. Minor Morris, who, some time ago, was separated from his employment by the Government. He had been connected with the Army Medical Museum, and his services had been dispensed with for reasons of which I have no knowledge.

Mrs. Morris, who was gowned handsomely and was a woman of impressive appearance, entered the Executive Offices of the White House just about 1 o'clock p. m. It happened that I was conversing with a friend in the reception room of the Executive building at the moment of her entrance. Being a woman of somewhat striking appearance, Mrs. Morris drew the attention of the gentleman with whom I was talking, and he asked me if I knew who she was.

Then for the first time I noted her particularly. She had asked to see Secretary Loeb, and, when directed to Mr. Loeb's doorkeeper, had given him her card with a request for a brief interview. The doorkeeper took the card into Secretary Loeb's office. A few minutes later he returned to the reception room and communicated some response to her. She turned from the doorkeeper and began restlessly to pace up and down the reception room. She appeared to me to be laboring under some suppressed excitement, but, at the moment, although I was sitting so that I looked in her general direction, I paid little heed to her. I attributed her evident nervousness, without thinking very much about it, to the feeling many people have who come to the White House for the first time.

In a few minutes Mr. Barnes, Secretary Loeb's first assistant, came out of Mr. Loeb's office and asked the doorkeeper for Mrs. Morris. I paid very little attention to the conversation—none at all, in fact—as it happens several times every day that Mr. Barnes is requested by Secretary Loeb to see callers whom he can not see by reason of pressure of business.

My recollection is that after Mr. Barnes had talked briefly to Mrs. Morris he returned to Secretary Loeb's office, and that, meantime, Mrs. Morris continued to pace nervously up and down the reception room.

At any rate, Mr. Barnes resumed his conversation with Mrs. Morris in a brief time. Both he and she were very earnest in their talk. Evidently in response to a request that she be accorded an interview with the President, Mr. Barnes—I happened to overhear—informed her that she could not see the President on that matter; that he had nothing to do with it, as it related to a departmental question, about which she would have to see the Secretary—what Secretary I did not know at that moment.

Mrs. Morris's response instantly attracted my attention to her particularly. She declared in a loud tone—almost, if not quite, loud enough to be heard in the office of the President—that she had come to the White House to see the President and proposed to see him, even if she had to camp out there a month. Her tone of voice and manner drew the attention of the three or four people in the reception room. Mrs. Morris and Mr. Barnes were standing at the time near the table in the center of the room, on the side nearest to the fireplace. Officer Frech, one of the doorkeepers, evidently noting the manner of Mrs. Morris, moved from the door to a point near the table.

Realizing that a scene probably was impending, I paid close heed to that which followed. Although I was within 12 or 15 feet of Mrs. Morris and Mr. Barnes, I could not distinguish all that he said. He spoke with evident firmness, but in a low tone of voice. I did hear him say, however, that such an interview as Mrs. Morris desired with the President was not possible of arrangement. He reminded her, too, that she was making a scene and begged her not to pursue the matter further. Following a further insistence by Mrs. Morris that she be permitted to talk to the President, Mr. Barnes requested her to leave the offices, assuring her again that she could not see the President.

At this Mrs. Morris became perfectly white. I thought it was the whiteness of anger, for, as I viewed her, she had manifested no symptoms of insanity. She declared that she would not leave the Executive Office; that it was a public building and she had a right to be there; and she dared Mr. Barnes or anybody else to try to make her leave.

Her tone of voice at this time was loud, and she was making, both in manner and tone, an ugly scene. Officer Frech approached her and, leaning toward her, admonished her to be quiet. Turning on him, Mrs. Morris exclaimed: "Don't touch me. I'll sit down, but I won't go away."

Although Officer Frech, up to this time, had not attempted to lay hands on her, Mrs. Morris backed away and finally sat down in a chair on the west side of the room, near the entrance to the clerical office. She continued to talk and gesticulate. Officer Frech approached her and requested her to leave the office. As he leaned toward her she cried, in a loud tone:

"Don't you touch me; don't you dare to touch me. I'm 50 years old, and I never had an officer's hands laid on me. I want to see the President—that is all."

Officer Frech tried to induce her to leave the room, but as she refused to move from the chair in which she was sitting he took her by the left arm.

Mrs. Morris is a woman of generous build, and it would not be an easy matter to move her if she resisted. She weighs, I should say, about 170 pounds, although, of course, my opinion is a mere guess.

As Officer Frech could not induce her quietly to leave the Executive Office, James Sloan, one of the secret-service operatives stationed at the White House, stepped forward and together they took hold of Mrs. Morris, practically lifted her from the chair, and urged her forcibly toward the door. Then it was that Mrs. Morris began to scream. She hung back and gave both officers serious trouble in getting her to the door. She screamed so loud that her cries could be heard all over the Executive Offices. She kicked at the officers, tried to get her arms loose in an effort to strike, and seemed to be trying to bite at their hands.

The scene was a most distressing one. Mrs. Morris cried as she was carried through the door, "Oh, my God, will nobody help me?"

The plaza in front of the Executive Offices was wet and muddy. After the officers had gotten Mrs. Morris outside of the doors and perhaps 15 feet from the entrance, Sloan relinquished his hold, his place being taken by a police officer stationed outside.

Until this time Mrs. Morris had remained on her feet, resisting the officers with all her strength. Finally, however, she dropped to the pavement, in a sitting posture, refusing to go farther. Thereupon the officers picked her up bodily and carried her along the driveway which leads under the porte-cochère of the White House. Seemingly they did their best to protect her clothing from the mud and water, but, in the circumstances, that was not entirely possible.

I did not see Mrs. Morris afterwards, not being present when she was put into the cab and sent to the house of detention.

As to her ejectment from the Executive Office, I am quite sure that no more force was used than was absolutely necessary. Had a man acted as she acted he would have been treated, probably, summarily. I did not hear Mr. Barnes order her put out of the offices. My opinion is that she ought to have been released when the officers got her outside of the entrance to the offices, but I understand that the police regulations provide for the action of officers in such cases, and had they released her they would have laid themselves liable to a suit for assault, once having placed their hands upon her.

Mr. Barnes did all that he could have been expected to do to avert a scene. He treated Mrs. Morris in a quiet and dignified manner, time and again urging her not to make any trouble. He might have permitted her to retain her seat in the Executive Office reception room, but, in my judgment, his action in that regard was purely a matter of opinion. He thought Mrs. Morris was insane, as I have learned since, and her action and manner, it is only just to say, probably warranted such an assumption on his part.

Very respectfully submitted.

E. E. PAINE.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. TILLMAN. The statement of Mr. Barnes is the White House statement—in effect, the President's statement—because the last letter from him, which I just had read, was written in April, after his nomination, and when it was understood at the White House that the man was on trial or that there might be a trial of him. Therefore it was made as plausible as possible, and the defense was presented in the best possible light.

Mr. President, having given what is the version of the occurrence of the people of the White House, substantiated by Mr. Paine, who was in the office when the occurrence took place, I want to show what actually took place, as I have claimed from the first, which I have always said on my responsibility as a man and a Senator I would prove, and which I am still ready to prove by as reputable men as there are in this city, and disinterested men rather than interested men.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a statement furnished me a few days after this unfortunate occurrence by one of the newspaper correspondents who was in the Executive Offices at the time, and which I would have proved and can yet prove to be absolutely correct by at least three other newspaper men. I will state here that the young man's name (he did not sign the paper then, because he did not feel that it was worth while, but he was always ready to respond to a subpœna to testify) is James H. Price, of the Times, Washington, D. C., and I ask that his statement may be read in order that we may have the other side of the story. It is Exhibit C.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXHIBIT C.

Statement proposed to be proved by Senator Tillman, and is apparently that of one of the witnesses he asks to have examined.

Coming in from lunch at 1 o'clock, I noticed in the general lobby, near Mr. Loeb's door, a lady, whom I afterwards found out to be Mrs. Minor Morris, sitting very quietly, evidently waiting to see one of the secretaries. I entered the press room and engaged in a general conversation with three newspaper men who were in there. The door to the press room is always open, and as the hour was near the President's lunch hour everything was unusually quiet in the lobby. Very suddenly we heard a loud exclamation which sounded like "Oh, no, no; don't do that." All of us jumped to the door and entered the main room, where we found a secret-service officer and Officer Frech in the act of pulling the woman out of the chair in which she was sitting. Prior to this we had heard no loud voice, and I am positive there was no boisterous conduct. A word spoken above an ordinary tone would have reached our ears very easily. Then men pulled the woman to the door, where Officer Murphy relieved the secret-service man. Their object was to get her to the guardroom, just opposite the Treasury building. To do this they had to carry her down the path leading to the basement of the White House and through the long corridor used during the receptions. Before going 20 feet Mrs. Morris fell to her knees, but was jerked to her feet and dragged on. Before they disappeared from sight she must have fallen six or eight times. Just before disappearing through the archway leading to the basement, I saw a negro man, Charlie Reeder, the President's footman, rush out and pick her up by the heels. The last I saw of Mrs. Morris she was being carried off like a sack of salt, with the negro at her feet and her dress hanging above her knees. I went around to the guardroom and saw Mrs. Morris literally thrown into an awaiting cab.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to some statements which have been made in the so-called "investigation" ordered, as I said a little while ago, by the President and performed by Major Sylvester. Commencing with the memorandum I have here, I call attention to the fact that Mr. Barnes three times, in the statement read a little while ago, speaks of Mrs. Morris as having shrieked; "shrieked at the top of her voice;" "shrieked her refusal." "As soon as she was on the outside of the office building she threw herself on the ground." And again he repeats the denial that a negro had anything to do with it. He does say that he did not see the finality before the woman was carried into the driveway under the White House, but that the two officers who were carrying her, or dragging her, had told him that they did not have time for "accurate" observation. Yet whether or not there was a negro mixed up with it or participating in it could have been found out in ten minutes by asking either one of the three newspaper men beside Paine, who stood in front of the Executive Office and watched the cruel and miserable performance.

Mr. Paine says her "tone of voice and manner drew the attention of the people in the reception room." Mrs. Morris did not scream until after they took hold of her. Mr. Barnes says she had shrieked three times, twice before they took hold of her. So there is a contradiction here among the witnesses for the defense.

Mr. Paine says: "After getting outdoors she dropped to the pavement in a sitting posture. Seemingly they tried to protect her clothing." C. H. Murphy, the man who helped Frech carry her—or drag her, as I will prove—after they had gotten her to the doorstep, says: "She sat down in the mud." And he states a fact which Mr. Barnes could have found out about without going any further, that the "negro draped her clothing around her feet;" that "her clothes were ruined, caused by sitting down in the mud," says Murphy. The negro was there. They did not deem it worth while to ask him whether or not he had caught hold of her ankles; nor did they dare ask. Mr. Barnes says they picked up her purse and back comb, or something like that. Did he ask what became of the money in her purse? She told me she had $7 or $8 in it, and that when she got to the house of detention it was gone.

Mr. Sloan says she "stood on the sidewalk." Stephen A. Connell—these two are Secret Service men—says "she stood on the sidewalk." Bramlett, a policeman, who was looking on or taking some part in it—I have not time to read all the various so-called "affidavits" of these policemen who were evidently endeavoring to shield each other and make the best of a bad case—says the "negro draped her feet," or covered her feet with her clothes. One of these policemen, or two of them, said she tried to "bite and scratch."

Another one said "she tried to claw Mr. Frech in the face." Mr. Frech himself says that she had gloves on, as any well-dressed woman would have in such a place. Her scratching or "clawing" was therefore impossible.

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, junior, I reckon, or senior, I do not know which, who was in one of the offices with somebody, came to the door when the shrieking began and in his statement says she "was not dragged." Major Sylvester states, upon the authority, of course, of his men, that she "was not dragged," and that she "sat down."

Mr. President, I call attention now to the only witness who was produced, or rather the only person who sent in any evidence whatever. It was not sworn to, in fact none of these statements were ever sworn to. The chief of police called on various men who had to do with it or saw it and they made statements, but they were not sworn. There was no evidence of any kind worth while ever shown the President, and he seems to have been very indifferent as to whether he had the facts or not, because he must have known that these newspaper men were there, and he had no good reason to single out Paine and ask him for his memorandum or statement and leave the other four or five unquestioned. I do not mean, of course, to say that he had no right, but he did not seem to care to arrive at the truth.

In regard to the dragging and the sitting down, Major Sylvester, in a letter which he sent to Mr. Loeb or to the President, I do not recollect which, states that Mrs. Morris called him up over the telephone the next morning after she had escaped from the clutches of his tender and kind officers and told him that she fainted when she got to the doorstep.

With the woman fainting and limp and so heavy to carry, in the performance of this duty she was carried out in an indecent and brutal way. Was it possible that men with mothers were so little thoughtful of a woman well dressed and to every appearance a lady, and who, as I am prepared to prove, is a good woman as far as any woman can be proved good? At least no one has proved her to be bad, and they tried hard to do so. I say, should not those men have taken cognizance of the fact that she had lost consciousness and was not able to stand up or walk even with their help?

Moreover, Mr. President, it is repeated in two or three of these statements, and Mr. Frech, the policeman, Barnes's brother-in-law, who had arrested her and afterwards lodged a charge of insanity against her, made a statement. I will send to the desk and have incorporated the official copy sent to me from police headquarters.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper will be printed in the RECORD.

The paper referred to is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, May 2, 1906.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith please find copies of certificates filed with the sanitary officer of this department, in conformity with your request of this date.

Very truly,
RICH'D SYLVESTER,
Major and Superintendent.

AFFIDAVIT OF LUNACY.

HEADQUARTERS METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT,
SANITARY OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1906.

I, the undersigned, being an officer duly authorized to make arrests in the District of Columbia, do certify under oath that I have apprehended and detained Alice Hull Morris, and from what I know and have seen of her I believe her to be insane or of unsound mind, incapable of taking care of herself or her property, and if permitted to remain at large or go unrestrained in the District of Columbia the rights of persons and property will be jeopardized or the preservation of public peace imperiled and the commission of crime rendered probable.

JACOB P. FRECH, M. P.,
719 C street NE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 4th day of January, 1906.
[SEAL.] JAMES A. KEMP,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy.
JAMES A. KEMP,
Chief Clerk Metropolitan Police Department,
District of Columbia.

[Copy.]

JANUARY 4, 1906.

This is to certify that I have this day examined Mrs. Alice Hull Morris, and do not believe her at this time to be of unsound mind.

J. S. WALL, M. D.
W. THOMPSON BURCH, M. D.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy.
JAMES A. KEMP,
Chief Clerk, Metropolitan Police Department,
District of Columbia.

Mr. TILLMAN. Frech, as I said, either thought then, or he very soon afterwards thought, because some one suggested it to him, that the woman was insane. Frech saw Seventeenth street less than 30 yards away on his left as he went out of the room with this woman. He could just as easily have stopped and held on to her, to comply with this bogus or imaginary rule of the police department which compels a policeman once he has put his hands on a person to complete the arrest and file charges. Frech could have called for a cab by telephone to come to that place, as well as over at the other end on Madison place next the Treasury, 200 yards away, and he could have performed his duty just as effectually and more in accord with decency and the rules of civilized society and of law and order. Among civilized people insane persons are treated with more kindness and consideration than others who are sane. Why was this lady treated so brutally?

But I want to get back to the question of the "dragging." I have pointed out extracts from the statements showing the repetition by one man after another, both inside of the house and outside, that she was not dragged. The only witness who had anything to the contrary to say was Mrs. Thornburgh, the matron of the house of detention, who says in her statement that "her dress was very much torn;" that it was "torn from dragging and being ground out on the pavement."

And, Mr. President, I have Mrs. Morris's skirt, a black silk dress, which she furnished me to use before the committee. In that skirt there are half a dozen or more rents, some of them across whole widths, some of them up and down, and some of them crosswise. But one of them is a round hole, about 4 inches in diameter, with the jagged, finely cut edges across the bias, as well as up and down the threads, which will prove beyond all possibility of dispute that they had dragged her along on that knee at least until, as Mrs. Thornburgh says, the clothing had been worn out—not only the silk, but the underclothing as well.

The skirt would prove every man in Washington who wanted to undertake to say she was not "dragged" the most arrant liar, to say nothing of the newspaper men who stood looking at the pitiful spectacle, who have been prepared, when summoned authoritatively, to bear witness to it, but who have not been asked or permitted to give their evidence under oath, and all of them are gentlemen.

Mr. President, there are other features of this unfortunate, disgraceful transaction to which I will now pass.

Mr. President, this woman, Mrs. Thornburgh, the matron, has a long story here sent from the White House as a part of the exhibit in the defense of Mr. Barnes's action, and among other things she said this:

Q. Did she leave you under the impression that she was demented?—A. Yes, sir. A great many demented people will drop down on their knees and pray, and before she would leave the office she dropped on her knees by the desk and sent up a petition for guidance and asked that her enemies be confounded, and that the President be brought to view the case of her husband; that it was a just and Christian act to do, and that he was influenced by people who had a grudge, or spite, against her—not her—but us. Afterwards she went upstairs and prayed again for support and the confounding of her enemies, which, to my mind, in the place where she was, was what a person in their right mind would not do. She prayed twice in my room.

Well, Mr. President, it is not for me to comment on what Mrs. Thornburgh's opinion in regard to these prayers was. I am not a praying man myself, at least I pray very seldom, and mostly my prayers are voiceless, but it is a strange proposition that because a woman under the conditions which surrounded Mrs. Morris prayed she should be regarded as demented.

I want to pass on to the action of the President. The day after I made my speech in the Senate on the 17th day of January—I presume it was the next day, because this letter is dated Washington, January 19—the following was written by Major Sylvester to Mr. Loeb:

[Confidential and personal.]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 19, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President, White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your reference of the 18th instant respecting inquiries you desired should be made of certain persons to whom you refer concerning Mrs. Minor Morris, and I beg leave to respectfully inform you that Dr. J. Wesley Bovee has for a number of years been intimately acquainted with Mrs. Morris's relatives, and he stated that from the history of her case and judging from reports he was of the opinion that her mind is not right, and that he would be pleased to confer with you on the subject if you so desire.

As directed by you, through Assistant Secretary Barnes, I have written the Hon. Thomas S. Rollins, at Asheville, N. C., in regard to information given you concerning the deposition of the physician in that city.

As to Mr. Stokes, that gentleman was not seen, as I was informed he had made a statement to you.

Mr. Jacobs, of Woodward & Lothrop's, was not disposed to give a written statement with respect to that firm's experience with Mrs. Morris, which was her excitement over delay in passing upon her check and certain matters in trade.

Mr. Boxer, at Kann's, stated there was nothing in the case there; that there was nothing to be said.

Mrs. Dunlap stated that Mrs. Morris had upbraided her for having placed her own name as chairman of the committee on a letter head and omitting the names of other members of the committee, a work which she had done at personal expense, and that the experience was very unpleasant.

I inclose herewith report of females taken up at the White House by the service there since 1903, as requested by you.

Very truly,
RICHD. SYLVESTER,
Major and Superintendent.

Then follows a letter addressed to Mr. Loeb, which I will have printed without reading, from Hon. Thomas S. Rollins, of Asheville, N. C., who, by the way, is a Republican State chairman of North Carolina, and he forwarded it as an exhibit in the Morris case; and a letter from one H. Bascom Weaver, M. D. I will not read it, but will have it printed. In it Doctor Weaver, if he is worthy of the name of "doctor," which I very much doubt, stated that he had treated Mrs. Minor Morris two years ago on her way from Florida to the North, and that she was "a crank and unbalanced." As soon as this became known—and I let Doctor and Mrs. Morris know it—they furnished me an affidavit, sworn to here by a notary public, that neither of them had ever been in the city of Asheville at all, two years ago or at any other time.

And later on this doctor did not scruple—his instincts and his code of medical ethics permitted him to write a letter in connection with one of his patients and not make it public, because he did not expect it to be made public—but he lent himself to the dirtiest conspiracy, the effort to convict this woman of being crazy. They had failed through Frech on the charge of insanity, sworn to the evening of her arrest; and that was long after her friend Mr. Guthridge had gone and deposited the $5 required in an ordinary case of disorderly conduct. They had kept her there in the hope, I suppose, that the two physicians whose duty it is to pass upon such cases would adjudge her insane and hustle her off to St. Elizabeth's. But the two doctors, Wall and Burch, would not sign any such certificates, although Doctor Burch did say in his statement given to Major Sylvester later that he thought there was something wrong with her. "She was hysterical." Of course she was crying. She was outraged. She had been brutalized or had been cruelly treated. And who would not? What woman, whether gentle-born or not, would not have exhibited those ordinary attributes of the female sex under such circumstances?

The letters referred to are as follows:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., January 20, 1906.

Hon. WM. LOEB, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have this day mailed to Major Sylvester a statement from Dr. H. B. Weaver in regard to Mrs. Minor Morris, which I trust will be of some service and information. Doctor Weaver is ex-president of the North Carolina Medical Association, and is one of the leading physicians in this State. If I can be of any further service to you in regard to this or any other matter, don't hesitate to call on me. With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Very truly, THOMAS S. ROLLINS.

P. S.—I inclose a copy of Doctor Weaver's letter for your information, but he prefers that his statement be not made public unless necessary.

ASHEVILLE, N. C., January 20, 1906.

Maj. RICHARD SYLVESTER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Rollins has just shown me your letter of the 19th instant, and while there is usually a relationship between physician and patient that is sacred and inviolate, yet there are times when even secrecy should be invaded for the good of the public. The White House episode of the Mrs. Morris affair is an instance illustrative of this fact. Not only is our Chief Executive brought unduly under unfavorable criticism, from which, owing to his high position, he is unable to vindicate himself, but the whole nation is attempted to be brought into disrepute by designing persons who wish to exploit themselves before the world. I deem it, therefore, eminently proper under the circumstances to state frankly as a physician my knowledge of Mrs. Minor Morris from a medical standpoint.

About two years ago, while Mrs. Morris was in Florida, through correspondence she came to Asheville and became my patient, or rather, I became her medical adviser, her husband being a physician. She remained in this city about six weeks, and from all I saw and heard of her actions I was forced to the conclusion that she was unbalanced mentally, or, in familiar parlance, a "crank," or, as we say, suffering from a mild form of insanity—a monomania. I do not deem it necessary at this time to go into the details of the symptoms which would be confirmatory of my diagnosis.

I have the honor to be, sincerely, yours,

H. BASCOM WEAVER, M. D.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall have incorporated, but will not read, the statement of Sergeant Gallaher as to what transpired when she was brought to the house of detention, and about what charges were filed or made against her, and why she was held.

Mr. Guthridge found he could not get her released by depositing the ordinary amount, because the sergeant had telephoned somewhere, and I afterwards find the testimony here that he had telephoned to Barnes, and Barnes refused to have her released. So that Barnes was easily responsible, not only for her first arrest, but her continued incarceration under the circumstances I have mentioned.

IN CHARGE HOUSE OF DETENTION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 12, 1906.

Statement made by Acting Sergt. John Gallagher, superintendent of the house of detention, to the major and superintendent of police.

I am the superintendent of the house of detention. On the 4th of January, I think it was, about 1 o'clock, a call came from the White House for the house of detention cab. The clerk gave me the message, and I went along in the cab to the guardroom, where I saw this lady—Mrs. Morris. Officers Frech and Brown and Mr. Stone, the head usher, brought her out and put her in the cab. I did not assist in bringing her out. As soon as I got there they brought her out.

The lady was very much excited, did not want to go, and fought the officers all she could; but it was not more than a second before she was in the cab. She did not fall down, but she tried to throw herself back. The officers had hold of her arms, one on each side, and Mr. Stone also helped put her in the cab. I did not see a black boy there; but there were eight, ten, or a dozen people around. She was crying out loud and screaming. She did not use any profanity. She did not bite the officers. The officers had to force her in the vehicle; they pushed her in, and she was resisting all the time. The officers did not use any more force than they had to to get her in. Her clothes were torn when I got there. I don't know who tore them. Officers Frech, Brown, and myself accompanied her to the house of detention. She made so much noise I said we would have to take her to No. 1; that we could not take her to the house of detention. She wanted to know where she was going, and I said to the house of detention. When I said that she slapped me in the face with her hand. I did not touch her. She did not seem to have all her faculties. When we got to the house of detention I took her to the clerk's office. When we got to the house of detention she got out of the cab and walked in the house without anybody putting hands on her. Officer Frech charged her with disorderly conduct. Afterwards the charge of insanity was made against her by Officer Frech.

When we got in the house she said she wanted to telephone to Mr. Guthridge, who is on Fourteenth street, and also wanted to telephone to Mr. Warner. She telephoned to Mr. Warner, and he was just going to leave town; and she telephoned to Mr. Guthridge, and he said he would be over as soon as he could. Doctor Burch was there at the time, had been there to examine an insane woman, and I telephoned to him from the White House to wait until I got there, which he did. I did that because I thought they were going to put the charge of insanity against this woman. When I got there Doctor Burch said: "There is no charge of insanity against this woman." I said to Officer Frech: "Aren't you going to put some charge against her? He said: "I will make the charge of disorderly against her; I can sustain that charge." I said: "You had better call up the station you belong to." He did so. I said: "What collateral do you want for her in case a friend comes and puts up collateral?" He telephoned to the fifth precinct, and said $5. I said to him: "If anybody comes and puts up collateral, shall we let her go?" He said, "Yes." I thought, to hurry up the matter, I would go over and see Mr. Guthridge. When I got there they said he had gone over to the house of detention. I telephoned to the clerk and asked if he was there, and he said he was, and wanted to put up $5. I said: "Take it and let her go." On my way back I stopped at the White House and saw Frech and said: "I suppose she has gone. A friend has put up $5 for her." He said: "No; I have put the charge of insanity against her." He said he had put the charge of insanity against her and he was the officer and complainant. I don't know why he put that charge. I went back to the house then and found Mr. Guthridge, her friend, there, and did the best I could until the doctors came to pacify her. She was in charge of Matron Thornburgh. When she went away she said she had been treated very nicely and shook hands with me.

But, Mr. President, returning to Doctor Weaver, I could not restrain my indignation a little while ago, thinking about a man, a southern man at that—I do not say that in any derogatory way of northern men not being just as chivalrous as we are—but the idea is incomprehensible to me that a man of the South, who occupies a position which they say this man has held, should undertake to help out a political ally or friend by sending that statement; but he afterwards, when the facts were brought out, crawfished out of it, and said he had been betrayed or tricked by having a letter, which he had given in confidence, made public. I send to the Reporter, and ask to have it inserted without reading, a clipping from the Asheville Gazette-News of Saturday, June 2, 1906, in which an interview is had with this pink of medical propriety, in which he says that he attended a Mrs. Morris, but was not prepared to say that it was this Mrs. Minor Morris; that in fact he had forgotten what her given name was. The only pity is that he had not stated that at first, instead of committing himself unequivocally and in direct terms to the statement that he had attended Dr. Minor Morris's wife, or words to that effect.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[The Asheville Gazette-News, Saturday, June 2, 1906.]

STATEMENT MADE BY DR. H. B. WEAVER—HE COULD NOT IDENTIFY THE "MRS. MORRIS" WHO WAS FORMERLY HIS PATIENT.

In view of the publication of his letter written Maj. Richard Sylvester, in response to a request to tell what he knew of the mental condition of Mrs. Minor Morris, and of the controversy which has raged in regard to the letter and his motives in writing it, Dr. H. Bascom Weaver, of this city, has finally consented to make a statement relative to the matter. Following is the letter:

ASHEVILLE, N. C., January 20, 1906.

Maj. RICHARD SYLVESTER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Rollins has just showed me your letter of the 19th instant, and while there is usually a relationship between physician and patient that is sacred and inviolate, yet there are times when even secrecy should be invaded for the good of the public. The White House episode of the Mrs. Morris affair is an instance illustrative of this fact. Not only is our Chief Executive brought unduly under unfavorable criticism, from which, owing to his high position, he is unable to vindicate himself, but the whole nation is attempted to be brought into disrepute by designing persons who wish to exploit themselves before the world. I deem it, therefore, eminently proper, under the circumstances, to state frankly, as a physician, my knowledge of Mrs. Minor Morris from a medical standpoint.

About two years ago, while Mrs. Morris was in Florida, through correspondence, she came to Asheville and became my patient, or, rather, I became her medical adviser, her husband being a physician. She remained in this city about six weeks, and from all I saw and heard of her actions I was forced to the conclusion that she was unbalanced mentally, or, in familiar parlance, a "crank," or, as we say, suffering from a mild form of insanity—a monomania. I do not deem it necessary at this time to go into the details of the symptoms which would be confirmatory of my diagnosis.

I have the honor to be, sincerely, yours,

H. BASCOM WEAVER, M. D.

When shown the above, Doctor Weaver stated that, as indicated in the letter, he had acted only through patriotic motives, and with no other idea than to give any assistance in his power to the President. "I was not," he said, "the one to make the advances, and when writing it supposed and was assured it would be respected as confidential. I was not consciously a party to any muck-raking performance, and I desire that to be clearly understood."

In reply to the question of whether he had ever treated Mrs. Minor Morris he stated that all he knew of the matter was that he had treated a Mrs. Morris, the wife of a physician, and a woman whom he believed at the time of writing the letter to Major Sylvester to be Mrs. Minor Morris. He was led to believe this by the similarity of the names, the fact that both were wives of physicians, from the published descriptions of Mrs. Minor Morris, and from the published accounts of her eccentricity and general conduct.

"No, sir," said Doctor Weaver, in response to a query, "I could not identify my patient of two or three years ago should I now see her. Should Mrs. Minor Morris be shown me I could not swear that I had ever treated her, or that she was my former patient to whom I refer. I was led to entertain that belief at one time, but in view of the denial of Mrs. Morris and her husband that the lady was ever in Asheville I am not prepared to dispute their assertions."

Doctor Weaver can not recall the initials or given name of the Mrs. Morris whom he formerly treated, for since she represented herself as being the wife of a physician he entered no accounts against her on his books, and any other records he might have had have been lost.

The significance of this statement is easily seen. It wholly destroys the value of such evidence as Doctor Weaver may have given and which is being used to secure the confirmation of B. F. Barnes, the hero of the drag out. Doctor Weaver stated in his letter he treated "Mrs. Morris," but he is not now prepared to identify Mrs. Minor Morris as the woman "in common parlance called a crank."

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, I want to get back to Major Sylvester. I want to say here that I have absolutely no feeling whatever against that officer. I have only met him once or twice, and then pleasantly. In what he did in this case I do not hold him responsible, because he did it at the command of the President of the United States.

Major Sylvester, having been given the job by Loeb, put the muck rake at work up and down by the police and the secret-service men through the streets and highways and the byways of Washington, of North Carolina, and everywhere else, and sending in reports, using the guardians of peace and order, the men paid out of the Public Treasury to keep track of counterfeiters and those who are evading the revenue and other laws of the United States, he makes this pitiful showing. He furnishes one or two letters, one being from this man Stokes, who kept the Portner.

The point I want to present is, what shall we think and where lodge the responsibility, and how shall we prevent a recurrence of this kind of thing, unless the American people can be made to understand the enormity of it and the outrage of it, that a respectable woman going to the Executive Offices in a legitimate way and behaving herself, possibly with some little lack of discretion and good sense, but still there were policemen and barred doors between the President and any harm; there was no danger to the President; she was there seeking to get an audience, to present her petition. It has been recognized, oh, so far back that I can not even recall the first time, that the right of petition, even to royalty, is a sacred right. This woman called to present her petition, and, because she did not behave just exactly according to the ethics and the code of Mr. Barnes, was arrested in this manner, dragged out, brutalized, every possible indignity put upon her, carried off, hustled to the house of detention, and charged with insanity; and when the request is made of the great and honorable Senate of the United States to investigate these facts in the privacy of executive session, to ascertain whether this man is fit to be or ought to be confirmed as postmaster of the city where he had performed this piece of cruelty, that great Senate felt unwilling or did not dare—I will not say that, but somehow or other it appears that way to me—that great Senate would not grant the pitiful little plea of this woman and those who tried to befriend her to let her show how she had been treated.

Major Sylvester's muck rake—I will call it—with the handle in the White House, had scratched about in Washington and got together a few pitiful stories of Mrs. Morris's eccentricities or excitability and hysteria, and one thing or another, and through other instrumentalities—I do not know where to locate them—all through this city and in this Senate, and I have heard whispered about for the last two months the most damaging stories about her past life. The effort has been made to blacken her reputation and to destroy all sympathy for her.

The chief of police was told to investigate, and though knowing there were five other men there besides the one who had written this statement—Paine—he never went to one of them, and Paine himself—and I will state that I would prove it if I had a chance—the evening of the occurrence was as indignant as anybody else that evening, and so expressed himself to his brother correspondents; but never a word of protest the next morning, when he changed his views and began to talk and say that Barnes was justified, and that everything that had been done was proper and could not be helped.

But, Mr. President, there is another phase of this situation right here, which I want to mention lest I forget it, and that is that just one month after Sylvester's pretended investigation—for it was only a pretense; probably he had an intimation that he must not make it thorough, that he must convict Mrs. Morris; I do not charge it—but just one month after this transaction, Mrs. Morris having been arrested on the 4th of January—on the 6th day of February a cadetship at Annapolis was given to the son of Richard Sylvester, a civilian, and a cadetship at Annapolis to the son of Elmer E. Paine, by Theodore Roosevelt, the only man who can give those favors.

I have been informed—I do not know, for I have not asked for any of these things during my years of service here—but I have been told that the cadetships which the President is allowed to distribute, as a perquisite of his office, are sacredly reserved for the sons of Army and Navy officers, who can not get into either of the academies because they have no Congressional district or State from which to obtain the appointment. Yet after this, probably unpleasant, certainly dirty work, by Major Sylvester, and after this remarkable transformation in the opinions and feelings of Mr. Elmer E. Paine, Paine's and Sylvester's sons are given recognition in a most remarkable and unusual way.

Mr. President, while it may be merely a coincidence—and I have been told that it was promised long before the occurrence—it is an unfortunate coincidence that the appointments should have been made just following the connection of these men with the effort to destroy Mrs. Morris's case.

I want to put into the RECORD—I shall not read it—the poem "Insomnia," which was designated as evidence of this woman's insanity. I do not understand all of it, but there are a great many hundreds of pages in Browning, in Kipling, in Ossian, and of some other men,

> Whose names the world will not willingly let die, that I do not entirely comprehend or sympathize with; but I will venture to say that these lines will strike some people as showing remarkable skill in making sentences and giving expression to thoughts that no ordinary mind ever had. I want to insert this in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission will be granted.

The poem referred to is as follows:

INSOMNIA.

Eyelids drawn by hand of fiend;
A thousand terrors, as of noisome things!
Of reptiles sleek and sinuous,
Spitting the poison from their gums,
Of beetles, wasps and asps, and nameless little things
That with a dot do sting the body to a pulp.
Legions of devils laughing
While their imps the heartstrings pull.
Roar of lions, screech of tiger cat
All habiting the brain,—busy too, as devils in their hell.
Pulses running burning lava,
Eyes surcharged with brine, hidden in their sockets,
Or puffing orbs to bursting,
That run down furrows that once were cheeks of snowy roundness
Eagles, and birds of prey, long beaked sit,
And from the heart do peck an atom every hour;
And chatter, while they make their feast.
For what man, all this?
Mayhap for nerves o'er wrought in Music's realm
Or for the mission to the sick
A life to others given;
Or book of sunny thoughts to gladden all who read
Writ by midnight oil, too long, too ceaselessly;
A fair star beckoning over there, a magnet to the man,
Or bird of beauty perched to lure by song so sweet,
That song and plumage are too fair and beautiful.
Mayhap a poem, of so rare a worth,
So wondrous in its prophecies
And yet its beauty digging entrails out of him who writ;
A painting, too, a story tells of tortures of the damned,
Extremes which meet in fervid heat
Turned, by excess, to bitter gall.
The receding or passing of the goal as he approached it,
The small, mean, little thing compared with what he felt,
And what his soul could feel.
So a statue; cold, unyielding,
Which should have breath, but would not,
Should speak; but silent and disdainful
Because it can not feel the lava in
Its author's burning veins.
And so the bard has writ of the torments of success.
Each wrought as best he could, and not in vain,
If but to know man's impotence.
And each a great truth tried to tell,
And oft with wizened visage
Comes foul-tongued Calumny,
And sears whate'er it looks upon
With deadlier poison than the nightshade's breath.
Another and a briefer yet,
The miser's gold to count, until hands palsy by the act.
A poor, mean quality, that makes men
Knaves and fools, forgetting God and all most dear
To hoard and worship for a few brief years,
In getting, hastening for themselves their end,
That they who follow them the gift may dissipate.
And what the meaning of all this?
How with devils laughing in his ears
And wild cats hissing,
Torrid heats and thirsts unsatisfied,
The Nemesis of overstriving, colossal, nebulous, yet real,
Can man his lesson find of patience for the end?
To trust and wait on promises of longer life, and larger,
For the breath into his statue,

Sweet charity returns unto his soul,
The truth within his story or his song?
Yet it is writ, and so ordained that man must work
That the spirit shall be tempered like the steel,
That the flesh shall be aweary, that all shall be a burden
That men shall turn to heaven for his goal.
The laborer shall toil and sweat,
His night's relief engaging,
For toilers of the brain and heart,
Ambitions weary slaving,
Each earns his modicum of rest
And wits upon the morrow
Eager for the promises, and morning light to come.
(Laura Hull Morris.)

Mr. TILLMAN. One final exhibit, and then I am through. On the 16th of February Doctor Morris wrote a manly and respectful letter to the President calling attention to the manner in which his wife had been treated, and asking for an apology or for some reparation by the Executive of the wrong that had been done to her. I will not read that, but I want it printed, and I ask permission that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be printed.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE NEW WILLARD,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1906.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: Having waited patiently a number of weeks that you might have ample time to ascertain all the circumstances connected with the insult recently offered my wife at the White House, and that you might make some expression of deprecation which would naturally be expected, it is now incumbent upon me as husband and citizen to demand a public apology for this outrage on womanhood and common decency.

It is unthinkable that such brutality would be tolerated anywhere in this country, but above all in the White House.

That my wife has been confined to her bed six weeks from the shock and injuries of this damnable treatment is bad enough, but I can say to you in all calmness that had the original orders from the White House been carried out as to her longer incarceration her life would have been sacrificed. It is therefore incumbent upon me to repeat my urgent request that you take action at once suitable to the circumstances which have shocked the entire nation.

Respectfully,
MINOR MORRIS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then followed the letter of Mr. Loeb, dated February 19. On that date Mr. Loeb, by instruction of the President, wrote the following letter in reply to the letter of Doctor Morris:

No. 15.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 19, 1906.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 16th instant, the President directs me to state to you that he had the superintendent of police of the District of Columbia, Major Sylvester, make a careful investigation of the circumstances connected with the arrest of Mrs. Morris for disorderly conduct at the Executive Office, and the superintendent submitted to the President all the affidavits of the persons whom he had examined. The President carefully went over Major Sylvester's report and the affidavits, and also personally saw Major Sylvester and some of the persons making the affidavits. He came to the conclusion that the arrest was justified, and that the force used in making the arrest was caused by the resistance offered by Mrs. Morris to the officers in the discharge of their duty, and was no greater than was necessary to make the arrest effective.

Under these circumstances the President does not consider that the officers are properly subject to blame. He was also satisfied that the kindest thing that could be done to Mrs. Morris and her kinsfolk was to refrain from giving any additional publicity to the circumstances surrounding the case.

Yours, truly,
WM. LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President.

DR. MINOR MORRIS,
The New Willard, Washington, D. C.

In other words, you think you have been wronged; you think you have been outraged; you think your wife has been treated cruelly, but I do not think so. I have examined—what? "Affidavits?" Not an affidavit was ever made in the case. It is another instance of the President's careless use of words. No person has ever made a sworn statement. I examined every paper as it came from the White House before being sent to the Printing Office, and made careful note of them, and had my secretary take a memorandum of them. I have got the memorandum in my office now, and I say there never was an affidavit made by anybody in the case.

There ought to be an investigation of this case in connection with some other matters. I am not the prosecutor of the Washington police. It is not my business; I do not concern myself about it; I am not on the District Committee; I take no interest in it; but since I have come to investigate and look into this Morris transaction I have had my attention called to certain things. One of them I saw mentioned in the papers. There are a large number of policemen stationed in and around the White House grounds, while large areas of the city are unprotected, and all manner of cutpurses and purse snatchers and thieves are running loose, and felonious assaults are being made on white women and white men, and especially on white women.

I do not want the President left unprotected. I think we might put a company of soldiers around the White House, if we are going so far along imperial lines, and let the police attend to their legitimate duties. Our young lady who was recently married and has gone across the water is heralded even now in the papers as "Princess Alice." I do not hold the President responsible for that, because he can not prevent a lot of fools on the headline department of the various papers, who see fit to do so, exploiting and hurrahing over and making news out of this young lady's visit over there. I am sure it is very obnoxious to her. But I say if this imperialistic programme of issuing orders to the Senate and the House is going to keep up, we may as well have a company or regiment of soldiers around there, and get ourselves adjusted by degrees to the transition from the simple republican manners of our fathers. If the country wants to go to the dogs or go to the devil along the lines of changing the form of the Government and surrendering the rights of the people into the keeping of one man, I suppose I will have to stand it.

But here is something that is really worth while, and to it I ask the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Some one told me—I can not recall who—that the police were very negligent in dealing with liquor sellers in the District. Upon inquiry—official, of course—I discovered this: I wrote to Mr. Darneille, the assessor of the District of Columbia, and asked him to give me the name and address of each one of the persons in this District who have paid for retail liquor licenses for the year ending June 30, 1906. He very kindly sent the list to me, and I have it in my hand. I have had the number counted and there are 540. I then asked the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have sent to me a report of the number of persons in this District who have taken out and paid for the permits to retail liquor, which permits, everyone familiar with the statute knows, are required before a man can safely retail liquor. He said it would take a considerable time; but the names were on file and any citizen who saw fit could go and look at it. He asked if I wanted the names. I told him, "No; I wanted the number," and I received a letter signed "Robert Williams, Acting Commissioner," which I will have printed. It is under date of June 11, 1906. His statement is to the effect that the persons who paid the United States for the privilege of retailing whisky are 865, showing that there are 325 illicit liquor dealers in this District. I will ask to have the letter of Mr. Williams printed in this connection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 11, 1906.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring again to your letter of this date and my reply thereto, concerning your request for list of pensons who are authorized to retail liquors in the District of Columbia, I have to state that after dictating my reply to your letter I called you up by telephone and made inquiry as to whether you desired the names of the dealers or only the number thereof in the District of Columbia.

You answered that what you desired in the premises was the number of dealers and that the names of the dealers and their places of business was not required.

Upon receipt of this information I directed James T. Worthington, stenographer to the Acting Commissioner, to proceed to the office of the stamp deputy in this city and make a count of the names of persons to whom special-tax stamps as retail liquor dealers had been issued from the 1st day of July, 1905, to the present date, and I have now to report that the record shows that 865 special-tax stamps have been issued to persons to carry on the business of retail liquor dealer in the District of Columbia.

Respectfully,
ROBT. WILLIAMS, Jr.,
Acting Commissioner.
